The technology already exists for particulate emissions to be substantially reduced through PM10 filtration. Such measures would benefit our health and our environment, would boost our environmental industry and create much-needed jobs, but instead the Government prevaricate. No doubt they have bowed to lobbying pressure from the industry and put back the deadline, to the detriment of everyone else.

The hon. Member for Luton, South praised some of the efforts of sectors of the car industry in trying to solve their problems. We, too, applaud those efforts. Much can be done—much is being done. We very much support the technical fixes, such as the CRT—the continuous regeneration trap—filtration, the efforts of Johnson Matthey, and all the work that is being done in that direction, but, as the hon. Gentleman revealed, if we are to have the benefit of these technical fixes, we will eventually need another technical fix, such as low-sulphur fuels.

We have many ancient buses on our streets today, which pollute our urban environments, as a direct consequence of Government policy. The hon. Gentleman challenged the Minister to respond on fiscal policies, and the Minister must do so. Yes, it can be a matter of fiscal incentives to get the technical fixes in place, but because of bus deregulation and privatisation there has been a tremendous lowering of standards, an increase in the age of the buses on the roads, and, indeed, a fall in their maintenance, which is critical if we are to deal with their emissions.

We accept that technical fixes have an important part to play. We are very much committed to the search for technical fixes, vehicle traps, the use of clean fuels and of cleaner fuels, but overall, no amount of technical fixing can solve the problem alone.

What is required was spelt out to the Government in the report on transport of the royal commission on the environment. The Government, for the first time in history, failed to respond to that report, which laid out a strategy for the whole nation. It explained why technical fixes alone are not enough, and why we must have an integrated and co-ordinated transport system and a national strategy aimed at encouraging and assisting people to use their cars less and to use clean, public transport more. The cleaning up of public transport and municipal vehicles to produce cleaner air for our citizens would reduce the costs to the NHS and the burden of human illness.

All that is laid out clearly for the Government, but they cannot rise to the challenge, because they do not accept national strategies or local government involvement. Today, when we launch the local government campaigns, we can expect the Government to reap the rewards of their total failure to act to clean up our environment and our air in the towns and cities of this country.

10.28 am

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I congratulate my very good friend the hon. Member for Luton, South (Sir G. Bright) on securing this important debate on air pollution by particulate matter. He advanced a great deal of detail, as did the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock), who speaks for the Opposition. I am as concerned as the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend, but I regret the party political rhetoric that she introduced into the debate. My hon. Friend sought to tackle the problem constructively, giving the Government credit where credit was due, but being constructively critical—not party politically critical—where he believed that the Government could have done more.

Towards the end of her speech, the hon. Member for Deptford said that the overwhelming majority of local government was under socialist control. I am pleased to say that I come from one of the few parts of the United Kingdom where the Conservative party has overall control. I refer to Macclesfield borough council, whose leader is frequently praised by the Labour and Liberal Democrat leaders for the policies that the council pursues. Only recently, it received plaudits for being one of the most environmentally friendly councils in the country.

Although I accept a number of the points made by the hon. Lady, I will not accept her claim that only Labour can reduce pollution. I am not sure, for instance, that, when buses were in the public sector, the companies involved made the investment in new vehicles and technology to which she referred.

Ms Ruddock: It is a matter of record that the bus companies bought more new vehicles when they were publicly owned. Since privatisation, the rate of purchase and renewal has decreased, and as a consequence the aging vehicles are producing greater emissions. Moreover, maintenance has declined under the new regime of privatisation and deregulation.

Mr. Winterton: I am not sure where the hon. Lady finds her facts and statistics. In my view, the age of a vehicle is sometimes less important than the way in which it is maintained. Having used public transport exclusively in the early part of my working life, I can assure the hon. Lady that buses used not to be maintained to the standard that she suggested.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South represents a constituency in which motor vehicles, both domestic and commercial, are very important to the local economy. He has immense knowledge of the industry, and he has done the House a service by raising the subject. I support not only his views in general, but his suggestions as to how the Government can reduce air pollution. He said that he supported their modest fiscal measures relating to, for instance, diesel fuel and unleaded petrol, but felt that they should go further. I agree.

Some years ago, I formed the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance. The last thing that I want is any Government measure that would further undermine or destroy our all too narrow manufacturing base. The Government owe it to the people, and to industry—which is the only source of non-inflationary sustainable economic growth—to help to reduce the pollution of our environment, and air pollution in particular.

I fervently believe that the Government, who have fiercely resisted a return to capital allowances, should consider that way of encouraging people to introduce new technology to reduce such pollution. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, along with my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to consider introducing fiscal measures—I use the phrase in its widest sense—and capital allowances. That would make possible technological advances which, certainly in the case of commercial and domestic motor vehicles, could make a major contribution to the reduction of air pollution by particulate matter.

Unfortunately, there is an anti-roads lobby. I believe that bypasses and properly assessed road projects can in themselves contribute to the reduction of pollution. Most pollution caused by vehicles occurs when they are idling in traffic jams and then moving forward a few yards. Congestion is a major problem, especially in urban areas. I regret the dramatic cut in road projects which would often enable traffic to flow more smoothly, thereby reducing air pollution.

As an asthmatic, my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South is perhaps better qualified to speak about the subject than most of us—the hon. Member for Deptford paid tribute to him on those grounds—but he also has considerable knowledge of the subject. The House, and the Treasury in particular, should respect that knowledge.

[Mr. Winterton]

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will respond positively, constructively and sympathetically, but I ask him not to pull his punches behind the scenes. He should urge the Treasury to introduce both fiscal measures and capital allowances, along with other measures to reduce air pollution.

My hon. Friend has done the House and the country a service by speaking as he has today.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of the debate. I also apologise to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) as I heard only half her speech.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) pointed out, this subject is important to everyone—not just those who endure air pollution in Westminster, where I live during the week. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Deptford spoke in party-political terms, because air pollution involves everyone in an apolitical sense. Public attitudes and public policy must be changed. Let us not pretend that every person who sits in a motor car jamming up The Mall, Millbank and Parliament square is a Labour or Conservative supporter; all those people are individuals, who have chosen to drive their cars. We need to change their attitudes. I travelled here by bicycle this morning, and I trust that the hon. Member for Deptford used public transport. She does not seem to be nodding, but I am sure that she uses public transport much more than her car. After all, this place is very well served by public transport.

The hon. Lady made two points. I do not wish to dwell on party-political matters, but she raised them. One was about local government, and how efficient it could be. I see that the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) is also present; she and I used to sit together on the back benches of Hammersmith and Fulham council. If I believed that that council used its funds efficiently when it was run by the Labour party, I might agree with more that the hon. Member for Deptford said, but in fact it was appallingly inefficient in those days. Money was spent on, for instance, a women's slide library and a women's bus, which—with a great fanfare—was bought for politically correct reasons and parked in the square. It travelled eight miles in a single year in order to be serviced.

Ms Ruddock: According to the hon. Gentleman, party politics have no place in the debate.

Mr. Robathan: I am replying to what the hon. Lady said. She made a party-political speech.

The hon. Lady also suggested that private enterprise and the market had no place in public transport and public policy issues. She particularly mentioned privatisation, and her approach sits ill with new Labour policies. I also see the way in which private enterprise drives matters such as transport much better than the old, dead hand of bureaucracy. I want a good transport system in this country, and such a system is not well driven by Government hand-outs, which have never worked. One has only to consider British Rail, which we shall be discussing this evening. When I was born, there were 15 stations in my constituency. Every one was closed by a nationalised British Rail, and one was reopened under a Conservative Government. Does the hon. Lady want to say more? No.

Ms Ruddock rose—

Mr. Robathan: Oh, yes.

Ms Ruddock: I in no way suggested that the private sector did not have a role to play. I paid tribute to parts of the private sector in the motor industry and others. I said that the policy of privatisation and deregulation has destroyed our public transport. That has happened in respect of buses. We have poorer and more expensive services and very much worse vehicles in general on our streets today than when the service was under public ownership. The same will happen with the railways, which are already in a dire state in the run-up to privatisation—and deliberately so, because of the Government's policies. The issue is party political because the Government—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. That was becoming a mini-speech rather than an intervention.

Mr. Robathan: I ask the hon. Lady to defend the record of British Rail. Many excellent people have worked hard, but can she defend its record in closing all those stations? Perhaps in Lewisham, too, the hon. Lady can identify one or two old lines, the course of an old railway on the map, along which once upon a time people travelled before nationalisation.

In my constituency there is a plan to build a new power station and it is causing great concern to many local people. I would say, as we sit under electric light, in an air-conditioned room, using electricity, that it is absolutely vital to air quality and health that we examine all such new bids to discover the impact of a new power station on a highly populated area. My hon. Friend the Minister has already mentioned the issue in response to a question that I asked him previously. It is absolutely essential that we do not, whether driven by the market or by other reasons, build power stations that will pollute not only my constituency but, worse, a highly populated area as the prevailing wind takes the air straight over the city of Leicester. It is important that such matters are considered in very great detail before they proceed.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My hon. Friend may like to know that the Isle of Wight is unique in having the only health authority in the United Kingdom which sponsors an asthma and allergy research department. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Sir G. Bright) for securing the debate and I suggest to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) that if he has any concerns about difficulties caused by pollution over Leicester he should send his constituents to the Isle of Wight to see the work being conducted there in trying to find a cure for this dreadful problem.

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Asthma caused by emissions from power stations is of great concern. As we sit here in London near Battersea and Bankside power stations, which have been closed, and the London Transport power station in Lots road, which has also been closed, we should consider whether centres of population are good places for emissions from power stations.

I am the president of the Electric Vehicle Association of Great Britain Ltd. I do not need to declare it as an interest since the post is entirely honorary. As the hon. Member for Deptford said, electric vehicles can play a part—but only a part—in reducing emissions in our inner cities. With the hon. Lady, I very much hope that the Government will consider further supporting research into the development of electric vehicles, which can play an important role.

Time is short and I know that my hon. Friend the Minister wants to get on. In considering emissions, we need to consider energy, and reducing its use, as has been mentioned. That includes the conservation of energy—an area in which the Government have taken great strides. It is a pity that we did not receive the Opposition's support in reducing energy use through fiscal means last year.

Ms Ruddock: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should remember that the Government have just cut the budget for home energy efficiency by a third.

Mr. Robathan: I thought that the hon. Lady might raise that. Who set up that home energy efficiency scheme? I seem to recall that it was the Conservative Government. The scheme has enabled some tremendous work to be done and it continues to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Sir G. Bright) specifically referred to diesel pollution. I am the chairman of the all-party cycling group. It is important that hon. Members should not only set an example—that is too easy and perhaps too trite to say—but, as is happening in the Department of Transport, should encourage the movement of public policy in the Departments for Education and Employment and for the Environment towards greater encouragement of cycling and walking. It is easy to mouth the words, but it needs to be written into planning policy guidance, and so on.

Reference has been made to private enterprise and we could briefly mention alternative energy sources. It is proposed that the ferris wheel planned for opposite this place—I am not entirely sure that I want to see it there—be powered by tidal power from the River Thames. Incidentally, it is a private enterprise proposal. The proposal is to be supported and applauded, but at the same time, through enabling measures, we should be encouraging the use of the River Thames as a transport highway.

I shall not dwell on public transport because, as the hon. Member for Deptford said, we all need to use it more. This place is so well served by buses it is extraordinary. One can get almost anywhere by bus, including late at night. I commend the London Transport bus map to the hon. Lady.

We need a change of culture and of public policy. We need to change the civil service attitude that the problem of transport congestion is solved by the building of a new road. That attitude has changed dramatically in my four years in the House, but we must go further. We must ask what is good for all the people of this country, not just for us as individuals who selfishly sit in our little boxes by day. Let us change the culture and let all parties and the Government take a total view and move forward in reducing air pollution and emissions from vehicles and power stations.

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I welcome the opportunity to respond to this important debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Sir G. Bright) on initiating the debate which, as he so rightly said, concerns an important subject which affects many people, including many who suffer from asthma and other conditions. My hon. Friend is among those who suffer from asthma, and he was able to bring to the House his personal experience, which I am sure is reflected among many of his constituents and the constituents of other hon. Members. I also pay tribute to him for the very authoritative way in which he took the House through a fairly detailed and technical subject. I am sure that he did full justice to the science involved.

I think that it is right in such a debate that we recognise at the outset that we are dealing with a technical and scientific subject that requires detailed consideration, which is very well repaid by coming to the right strategic conclusions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South and my hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) have said, the debate calls for a constructive response.

I hope that the House will not mind if I am not tempted down some of the wider avenues down which the House was taken earlier. I agreed in part with some of the comments of the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock). It is important for the sake of all those affected by this important subject that we all try to take a constructive approach toward it. I agreed with some of her observations, but I am sure that she would not expect me to agree with all of them. I most firmly disagree, however, with her point about a holistic strategy. All the evidence of the Government's work over the past few years points towards formulating a holistic strategy on the basis of very careful scientific analysis. The hon. Lady referred to some of that analysis: the Expert Panel on Air Quality Standards, the strategic document "Air Quality: Meeting the Challenge", and the report of the Committee on Medical Effects of Air Pollutants. We are trying to proceed on the basis of proper, informed scientific debate.

I shall briefly address some of the detailed points made by the hon. Member for Deptford, which require explanation, rather than some of her wider points.

The hon. Lady referred to the limit of 50 microns proposed by the Expert Panel on Air Quality Standards and to the health effects that were the basis for that proposal. It is important that the public understand that the panel proposed that standard on the assumption that although associations between particles and ill health are causative, particle pollution episodes are most likely to exert their effects on mortality by determining the time of death of those rendered susceptible by pre-existing illnesses. She will know that some of the sources of particles occur naturally; that is why it is so difficult to reach a conclusion about a safe standard. Even those which occur naturally—without any additional human-caused particles—would have some effect on health.

The hon. Member for Deptford asked when the standards will be adopted, and I refer her to the expert panel's report and the Government's response to it. I draw her attention to the Government's response to the report of the Committee on Medical Effects of Air Pollutants, which answers many of her questions. She should be aware that the Government have accepted the expert panel's recommendation that annual average levels of PM10 should continue to be reduced progressively. If I have time, I will explain in detail the measures that we are putting in place to reduce those levels.

The Government have accepted the conclusion that the 50 micron level represents a level at which the large majority of individuals will be unaffected, and we have adopted that level as a relevant benchmark for policy. Importantly, we are committed to considering as quickly as possible whether such a level should be adopted as a target for policy in line with the air quality strategy review now being prepared under the Environment Act 1995. The air quality strategy, which will be available shortly, will be the basis for our holistic strategy.

Ms Ruddock: When will the strategy be made available?

Mr. Clappison: The hon. Member for Deptford knows that we are working towards a strategy based on the best scientific advice, and consideration must be given to that advice. She would expect no less.

The hon. Member for Deptford asked about smaller particles—an important subject. The Department of Health is looking at the evidence on the effects of particles smaller than PM10, and my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South referred to the fact that smaller particles can remain suspended in the atmosphere for longer than larger particles. It is thought that, in some circumstances, smaller particles can have more profound effects once they have been inhaled. The Department of Health is looking at that matter.

I reject what the hon. Member for Deptford said about local authorities, because the Government are working constructively on the matter with local authorities of all political views. It was a bit rich for the hon. Lady to imply that the Government were failing to work with local authorities and then—in the next breath—to refer to the trials of the new duties taking place in 80 local authorities in 14 different areas up and down the country.

The hon. Member for Deptford asked for guidance to be issued, but it would be premature to give detailed guidance before the national air quality strategy setting out our detailed strategy is made available. That strategy will be available shortly.

Ms Ruddock: When will local authorities start their pilot schemes?

Mr. Clappison: Local authorities are already undertaking the work, and a local authority liaison group is in operation. There is no question that the Government are working in partnership with local authorities.

I wish to refer to the important issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South in his constructive speech. He talked about the new technology available for diesel vehicles, and referred to the continuously regenerating trap. He dealt constructively with the costs and benefits of such a system, and pointed out that the balance of costs and benefits is likely to change over time. The Government will keep the issues that he raised under careful review, because there is clearly potential for important progress to be made in reducing emissions through that technology, including that developed by Johnson Matthey.

I come now—in as much detail as I can manage—to our overall strategy to reduce particulate matter and to make a major contribution to improving health. The House heard that, last November, the Government welcomed the report of the Committee on Medical Effects of Air Pollutants, and the report of the Expert Panel on Air Quality Standards recommending an air quality standard for particles. The reports concluded that even at the much lower levels now found in the United Kingdom—I emphasise that the levels are falling—particulate matter worsens the condition of people with lung or heart complaints.

The reports give a clear indication that managing and improving the levels of particulates must be one of the top priorities for air quality. The Government have accepted the expert panel's recommendation as a relevant benchmark for policy and we are determined to continue to reduce average levels of fine particles. Our policies and tools for doing that will be set out in the national air quality strategy.

We must deal first with the medical facts—some of which I have mentioned—which have been carefully scrutinised by the committee on the medical effects. The committee's findings ranged across a number of conditions, including heart and lung complaints and other respiratory conditions, and the committee made some important remarks about causation.

The expert panel recommended that a standard of 50 microns should be adopted, and that this should be measured on a 24-hour running average. Measurements of fine particles such as PM10 are relatively recent, but we have been measuring black smoke for several years. From these measurements, we can estimate that average and peak urban levels of fine particles have fallen more than tenfold since the 1960s. Annual average levels of PM10 are now roughly half the expert panel's recommendation, but in our towns and cities—another important point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South—the 50-micron limit is exceeded roughly 10 per cent. of the time. The panel recommended that that figure and the annual average concentrations of PM10 should be progressively reduced.

Much of the particulate matter is from natural sources, but I wish to refer also to the measures to be taken to reduce those from human sources. Road transport causes 25 per cent. of all pollution, but the figure is much higher for particulates in urban areas. It is clear that action needs to focus on measures to reduce emissions from road transport to cut particulate levels.

We have not been waiting for the evidence to be firm before acting. Since 1992, the standards of all new on-road vehicles have been progressively tightened. The latest standards—introduced after a breathing space of only three years—were introduced in January this year, and reduce the particulate limit for new lorries and buses by 58 per cent. Further tighter standards will be brought in for diesel cars next year to reduce emissions relative to the 1993 standard by 43 per cent. Standards are being agreed for light diesel vans for implementation in 1997 and 1998. These regulations reduce not only particle emissions, but other noxious emissions.

On the basis of these measures, we expect to see a fairly dramatic drop in emissions from transport over the next 10 years as older and dirtier vehicles are removed from the fleet. As I have said, these measures are especially important because of their significance during winter smog episodes. Emissions of sulphur dioxide and smoke from domestic households are controlled through the smoke control areas system, introduced in the Clean Air Act 1956. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 was also a landmark because it introduced integrated pollution control for 2,000 of the most polluting processes and subjected a large number of other processes to local authority air pollution control systems. That will make a further substantial contribution to reducing emissions of particles, as will bringing integrated pollution control to bear on large combustion plant for generating electricity.

Those measures will all contribute to reducing emissions, as will the encouragement that the Government have given through fiscal measures on road fuel duties. My hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield made a most important speech about that matter. Although I cannot speak with full authority on the subject, my hon. Friend will have drawn inferences from the changes which were made in last year's Budget.

Service Children (Boarding Allowance)

11 am

Mr. David Jamieson (Plymouth, Devonport): I am pleased to have secured this debate and that you should be chairing it, Madam Deputy Speaker, as I know of your personal interest in the welfare of service families. This is an opportunity to discuss several important matters—in particular, service children's education. I have raised some of the matters which I intend to raise today in previous Navy debates. I have done so because they are important to Devonport, where many service families live.

Previous defence debates have properly centred on issues of hardware, equipment, security and jobs. Unfortunately, at the end of our last Navy debate, because so many matters of such great importance were raised and due to the exigencies of time, the Minister had to gloss over his response to my remarks about the welfare of service families. Today is an excellent opportunity for him to give a fuller response. I know that, with his usual good humour and his expert knowledge, he will be very much welcomed in the debate today.

The care of service families and, in particular, their children is essential to front-line efficiency and effectiveness. It is essential for service parents, in order to have peace of mind, to know that their children are in good hands. Service families are in a special position. Not only do service men and women risk their life in the service of their country but they often sacrifice personal freedoms that are enjoyed by civilians. Service families may be required to move frequently and their family life and children's education may be disrupted.

Some children go with their parents on postings abroad. The Service Children's Education Authority runs excellent comprehensive schools in mainland Europe which are attended by service children. I am told that the standard of those schools compares with that of the very best schools in Britain. I warmly congratulate the authority on its work in operating the schools and I congratulate the teachers and the other people who run them.

However, some families choose to have their children stay in Britain and take advantage of the boarding school education that is available here. I am aware that the Bett report will review that entitlement and, in particular, whether families located in one place and unlikely to move ought to continue to receive the allowance. I believe that that review should proceed in the fullness of time.

The Ministry of Defence provides the boarding school allowance to meet the fees of children who attend boarding schools in Britain. Service parents have to pay at least 10 per cent. of the cost of sending their child to the boarding school. The scheme is overseen by the Service Children's Education Authority, which gives advice to parents on boarding education and produces the admissible schools list. Last year, there were 815 schools on that list, of which 663 had pupils from the BSA scheme.

In 1994-95, a total of 11,363 service children benefited from the scheme, at a considerable cost to the taxpayer. The cost for that year was £107 million. That is almost twice the funding that one would expect to be provided for day places in local education authority schools. The cost of a day place in an independent school is £3,500 to £4,000 per annum. An LEA school receives between £2,000 and £2,500 a year. The boarding part of the fee usually doubles the cost of the child's education. So the lowest cost for a child to receive boarding education under the scheme is probably about £7,500 per year.

[Mr. David Jamieson]

In today's debate I wish to concentrate minds on the operation of the boarding school allowance, especially on the role of the Service Children's Education Authority. I shall show that deregulation is causing potential risk to the learning and general welfare of children. I support the BSA scheme. The debate is not about whether the scheme should exist; it is needed to provide continuity of education for service children when their parents are expected to move around the country or the world. However, the scheme in its present form tends to favour the higher ranks. Anyone can see that 10 per cent. of the fee is a greater proportion of a sergeant's pay than of a major's pay.

More could be made of the local education authority boarding schools. The Service Children's Education Authority recognises that they are as good as or, in some cases, better than other schools. In its advice to parents, it says of the LEA boarding schools:

"these schools are often able to provide better facilities and a wider curriculum than many independent schools."

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): The hon. Gentleman says that the scheme favours higher ranks. If he looks at it differently, he will note that it favours people who tend to be over 40 who have children of school age. Most of the more junior ranks will leave the services earlier. The hon. Gentleman will discover that most people serve approximately five or seven years in the armed forces and leave before they are even 30. A full career for a non-commissioned officer takes him to the age of 40 and officers go on further than that. That is a pertinent reason why the scheme favours higher ranks.

Mr. Jamieson: I accept the hon. Gentleman's argument. I do not want to go into the matter for too long, but if one takes two people in exactly the same circumstances serving for the same period, the person of a junior rank is at a disadvantage under the scheme compared with the person of a senior rank on higher pay. Obviously, the pay of a sergeant who may have children in school is less than a major's pay and 10 per cent. of the fee is a considerably greater proportion of his pay. That is the point that I am making, but I fully accept what the hon. Gentleman says: people who serve longer in the services will benefit more from the scheme.

Many local education authority boarding schools are better than and all of them are cheaper than the independent schools. I wish to know from the Minister why they are not included on the admissible schools list. Why do parents have to send for a separate list of the LEA boarding schools? Why are they not put on the list so that parents can see them? Why are some schools on the list in the first place? Why are they not excluded? The Service Children's Education Authority gave the following advice to parents in relation to all-age integrated independent schools:

"Nevertheless, there are some, and especially some of the least expensive, that may be said to fall short of really satisfactory provision. Parents must take care and seek good advice."

The advice continues:

"You will be particularly wise to take advice when considering schools in this area of the market."

The Service Children's Education Authority is putting a health warning on some of the schools that it has on its list. I ask the Minister: why are the schools on the list if the SCEA feels the obligation to give a health warning about their quality? Why are the boarding schools in the LEA system not on the list when the SCEA says that many of them provide a much better education at a lower cost? Today's debate is not about the principle of the scheme—which I support—but about its operation and the quality of advice to parents. Today's debate is not about the principle of private education—it is not an attack on private or independent schools.

I recognise that many independent schools are excellent and that the majority are at least satisfactory, if not good. One could argue that they should be giving a good education because, in most cases, they are funded at a much higher level than local education authority schools. However, I am concerned about those schools that are falling below the standard that they should achieve. Evelyn Waugh described independent schools with acerbic accuracy in "Decline and Fall" when he said:

"We class schools into four grades: Leading School, First-Rate School, Good School, and School. Frankly, School is pretty bad."

The SCEA should closely examine some of the schools that Evelyn Waugh would class as "school". What are the issues for the schools in the boarding school allowance scheme? First, what checks are made on academic standards in the schools? Secondly, is the taxpayer getting full value for money from the £107 million spent in the schools? Thirdly, is there a threat to the value and existence of the reports on boarding schools from social services departments? Finally, does the Service Children's Education Authority need to revise its role, its practices and its advice to parents?

I refer to academic achievement. For many decades, Her Majesty's inspectors of schools have had the role of inspecting the quality of schools. Since 1993, the Office for Standards in Education has taken over that role. Among other things, it looks at the quality of teaching, academic standards achieved and the value for money that the school gives. When Ofsted was set up, it was the intention that local education authority schools would be inspected every four years and that independent schools would be inspected every seven years.

I shall contrast what happens with an inspection in a local education authority school with an inspection in an independent school. If an LEA school has an inspection, there has to be a pre-meeting with the head, the governors and the parents. When the inspection is completed, a summary of the report has to be sent to all parents in the school. The parents are also informed where they can get hold of the full report on the school should they wish to see it, which is usually within the school and provided free of charge. The report is also made public. Therefore, it is available for the wider community to look at and, if necessary, for comment in the press. I have no objection to that procedure.

When deficiencies are found in the school, an action plan has to be drawn up, where appropriate, which is overseen by the LEA and the inspectors may have a role in coming back at some future time. In extreme cases, where a school is deemed to be failing or to be substantially substandard, an education association can be sent into the school and it can be made grant maintained or, in extreme circumstances, it can close. As hon. Members know, that has already happened to the Hackney Downs school in London.

I contrast that approach with that of the independent schools. There is a dwindling number of reports on the independent schools. In the past two weeks, I have received a letter from the chief executive of Ofsted. He said that in 1993-94, there were 19 inspections of independent schools; in 1994-95, there were 13; in 1995-96, there were just nine; and in 1996-97, up to three schools will be inspected in the independent sector—none, one, two or three schools may be inspected. I have concluded that Ofsted is going to cease inspecting independent schools.

I have seen some of the inspections that have been made on independent schools and they show the same wide spectrum of achievement that one sees in local education authority schools and in grant-maintained schools. Some of the reports on the schools are excellent, most are good or satisfactory, but some are poor. If they were LEA schools, they would be deemed to be failing schools. Such a school has no obligation to show the report to parents. On 17 February 1994, I received a letter from the then Under-Secretary of State for Schools who referred to Ofsted reports on independent schools as follows:

"Any such school which is the subject of a published report is supplied with copies of it which it can distribute as it sees fit."

He then said:

"The onus is on the school to distribute the report to interested parties or to advise them where the reports can be obtained."

Many of the smaller independent schools, private schools, have no governors—there is just a proprietor and a head, and in some cases the proprietor is the head. I refer to meetings to discuss what is in the report and to what Ofsted said in its document "Inspecting Independent Schools":

"It is for the proprietor and/or governors to decide who else shall attend the meeting."

The inspectors are not obligated to call parents or anyone else into the meetings to discuss the report, other than the proprietor—who can choose who he informs.

Last year, Finborough school in Suffolk had 123 pupils from the boarding school allowance scheme. The head of the school wrote to the parents in 1994 regarding an Ofsted inspection that he had had the previous year. He wrote to parents—one of whom is my constituent—as follows:

"We have not obtained copies of the Report for parents because", and he then listed a number of reasons, one of which was:

"we were extremely unhappy about the way it was carried out and what we believe are serious statistical misrepresentations of the evidence of teaching standards."

He rejected the report because it was critical of his school, of which he is the principal and proprietor, and from which—I dare say—he receives profits. If he had been a local education authority head teacher, he would have been committing an offence by not providing the report to parents.

The message is very simple: if an independent school has had an Ofsted report and it does not like it, it can commit the report to a dusty shelf or to the bin. I am pleased that, in the case of Finborough school and one other school, as a result of pressure from me and my writing to the Minister, the report was sent by the Service Children's Education Authority to service families of children at the schools who were receiving funds through the boarding school allowance scheme.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): The hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that head teachers in the local education authority sector write to parents rejecting the result of Ofsted inspections. That happened in my constituency recently. What he describes is not by any means restricted to independent schools.

Mr. Jamieson: Head teachers or governors can write to parents disagreeing with reports; it is their right to do so. I do not say that the head teacher did not have the right to put his view, but it is not right that the head teacher of an independent school can block parents from seeing a report or even knowing of its existence, as in this case. At an LEA school, the head teachers and governors are obliged by law to give all parents a summary of the report and make sure that the full report is available in the school. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman, on reflection, would agree that, if that is right for LEA schools, it must be right for independent schools, and especially for those schools that receive substantial sums of taxpayers' money—£107 million altogether—through the scheme.

Mr. Hawkins: The hon. Gentleman described a head teacher who wrote to parents to tell them that there had been an Ofsted report. It is possible for parents to write to Ofsted, as I did in my constituency, to get a copy. They were made aware that there had been an Ofsted inspection and could have got the report themselves.

Mr. Jamieson: I do not want to get too engaged by this, but a local education school has an obligation under the law to provide a summary, and to provide the full report in the school, to the parents. Many parents, including my constituent, did not know of the existence of the report or inspection until I pointed out that the inspection had taken place. Eventually, under pressure, the Service Children's Education Authority sent my constituent a copy of the report. When he read it—and, by then, it was nearly a year out of date—he wished that he had taken his children out of the school earlier than he had. We need the same rules for both sorts of school. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees with that.

Ofsted is no longer able to safeguard academic standards, because no inspections will take place. It performs a short registration inspection every five years but says that three inspections at most will take place next year. On that basis, we have moved from one inspection every seven years to one every 700 years as there are now 2,294 independent schools. We need full inspections of independent schools, especially of those that benefit from substantial sums of taxpayers' money and reports, as with local education authority schools, should be sent to interested parents.

My second concern involves boarding and pastoral arrangements. That is especially important because children in boarding schools are, by definition, detached from their parents. Often, service children's parents are not even in the same country but are a long way away.

[Mr. Jamieson]

We need police checks on the people employed in the schools and we must ensure that the conditions of the Children Act 1989 are properly discharged.

in the late 1980s, there was much justified concern about several schools. I shall briefly refer to some of those concerns. In May 1989, there was the case of Crookham Court school near Newbury. The then Member of Parliament demanded an inquiry but was told by the then Department of Education and Science that it was "powerless to act". The school was described as "dirty and depressing". It had safety hazards and unsatisfactory teaching standards, but there was much worse to come. The head teacher and a member of staff were convicted of serious sexual offences against boys at the school. Those boys were mainly from service families. The significance of that case is that the school was closed not by action taken by the Ministry of Defence but because of publicity given to the school by Esther Rantzen in her "That's Life" programme. It was closed not because of action taken by inspectors, Government Departments or the MOD but because the media took the matter up.

That was not an isolated instance. There was the case in 1982 of St. George's school at Great Finborough in Suffolk. The BBC's "Checkpoint" programme said:

"This remarkable establishment specialises in educating the children of servicemen, and by all accounts makes Dickens's Dotheboys Hall look like a holiday camp."

A former games master at the school

"was one of a number of ex-staff who told Checkpoint about repression, brutality and more . . . Ninety-five per cent of the 250-odd boarding pupils are children of servicemen".

Very much worse was revealed by "Checkpoint" about serious abuse of children. Those facts were revealed not by the DES or the MOD but by the media. That school did not close; it carried on trading and I believe that it is still open under very different management and a different name.

My last example is the 1990 Her Majesty's inspectorate report on the Hilsea school in Basingstoke. The report was disastrous in every respect. It uncovered poor teaching, unsafe buildings and hopelessly out-of-date teaching methods and said that 92 per cent. of the children were from armed forces families. That school did not close in 1990; it carried on despite the report. It closed in 1992 only because of declining pupil numbers, yet it was supported almost solely by the taxpayer right to the very end. Had it been an LEA school, it would have been deemed to be failing and would probably have been closed.

For balance, there are some excellent schools. I have chosen an independent school that was established and run by the MOD—the Duke of York Royal Military school, Dover. The inspectors reported on it in February 1991 and said:

"This is a good school with high standards of work and behaviour, excellent care, sound teaching, generous resources, spacious premises and generally good accommodation. It is clear that the school achieves the aims as set out in its prospectus."

Oh that all the schools were as good as that one.

Partly as a response to concern about the inadequacy of certain schools, section 87 of the Children Act 1989 created a duty for the social services departments of local authorities to inspect the boarding and pastoral arrangements of such schools. I have seen some of those reports. They are very thorough and exacting. They check hygiene, dormitories and whether there are unnatural punishments or abuse. However, I well recall considering in the small hours of one morning a clause of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Bill which gave independent schools the right to choose their own inspectors and, if they wished, to dispense with local authority social services departments, which would probably know schools and their past records well. Most independent schools are continuing with local authority social service department reports, but is this not yet another opportunity for a bad school to opt out of inspection that may be critical?

Many independent schools belong to independent schools organisations and some internal reporting goes on between schools. Sometimes that leads to schools inspecting each other. Last year, CfBT produced a report called "Ofsted and Onward". CfBT is one of the leading private companies in the inspection field and has been much praised for its work. Mike Douse, one of its inspectors, talked of mutual inspection and said:

"To take one extreme and hopefully non-representative case, the Report on one non-government school . . . the only definite criticisms applying to the lack of facilities (including one major safety issue) and the need to 'strive for a more adventurous approach to work'."

That is what one school said about the other. He continued:

"But, in reality, this Independent institution is—if the term has meaning—a 'failing school'. Its fees are high and its pupils drawn from wealthy (albeit often broken) families, the sons and daughters of military officers, British expatriates, and successful businessmen."

This school must still be on the admissible schools list, yet he continues:

"Very many of its pupils fail to gain entry to the public schools of even their second—or third—choice; several teachers are incapable of keeping order, let alone organising and encouraging learning; bullying and other forms of unacceptable behaviour are rampant; and 'value for money' is a cheerless joke."

If the SCEA can find out which school it is, it ought to review whether it should continue on the list, receiving substantial sums of taxpayers' money.

Can we also check on how the money is spent in independent schools and on the level of profit being made by the proprietor? I repeat that some are not charitable foundations. They have a sole proprietor and are run as a business and a limited company. For many of the independent schools on the boarding school allowance, a substantial part, if not most, of their funding comes from the taxpayer through the scheme. We might want to look through the company accounts to find out how money is being spent, but if a company's turnover is less than £2.8 million a year, there is no obligation to publish full accounts. The company can publish abbreviated accounts, which are totally unhelpful if one wants to find out how the money is spent.

In contrast, governors, head teachers, the local education authority and parents can all see the budgets of local education schools that are spending taxpayers' money and see how the money is spent. If a parent wants to see the budget and how money is being allocated, it can be done at any time through the head teacher or the governing body. Yet no one has the right or duty to check how taxpayers' money is being spent in independent schools.

Mr. Hawkins: Surely the hon. Gentleman must acknowledge that all the matters that he has discussed in connection with local education authorities, such as the rights of parents and of governors, are the results of our educational reforms of recent years—reforms that the Labour party opposed, tooth and nail, at every turn.

Mr. Jamieson: In that case, I would expect the hon. Gentleman to agree that those reforms ought also to extend to the independent schools that are receiving substantial sums of taxpayers' money. If he speaks later in the debate, I will be interested to hear him confirm that that is his view.

What is the role of the SCEA, which acts on behalf of the Ministry of Defence? It seems to do little more than administer the system and distribute the fund. It has no right of entry to independent schools and the Minister of State for the Armed Forces confirmed that in a written answer on 2 April, when he said:

"SCEA staff visit independent schools by invitation to assess pastoral care arrangements for service children; they have no statutory right of access. Visit reports are therefore written on the understanding that they remain for internal use only."—[Official Report, 2 April 1996; Vol. 275, c. 103.]

The SCEA does not have the right of access and parents do not have the right to see what reports are written.

To protect the academic and pastoral concerns of pupils action needs to be taken. The SCEA needs to be far more robust. If schools are to go on the admissible schools list and receive substantial amounts of public funds, the SCEA should draw up a contract for them and they should agree in it that its inspectors have the right to go into the school and look at the pastoral arrangements.

The SCEA must ensure that it sees a school's full audited accounts, so that it can find out how the money is being spent. If a school is not prepared to undergo such inspections, fair enough—it is a private company—but strike it off the list and deny it taxpayers' money. Also, the SCEA should make all information on an independent school available to parents and potential parents.

Schools that have a low academic performance or where there are other concerns should be taken off the admissible schools list. In a recent answer about the Quantock school in Somerset, the Minister said that his inspectors had visited the school and found it suitable to remain on the list. I must draw to his attention the fact that the Independent Schools Association Inc.—the trade organisation—has terminated the membership of that school. I am sure the SCEA and the Minister would want to look into that and find out why. It is extremely unusual for that to happen, and there must be good reasons.

Much more stringent checks must be made on the schools that go on the admissible schools list. Two years ago, the Minister with responsibility for schools told me in a letter:

"As far as participation in the Government's Assisted Places Scheme is concerned, all 295 schools have had to satisfy a very stringent criteria for admission and must be able to demonstrate the highest academic achievements."

I want those criteria to be applied to schools on the admissible schools list. If they are right for assisted places schools, they must be right for the children of service families who attend independent schools.

The Minister should consider the matter carefully and advise the Department for Education and Employment that there is a need for full Ofsted inspections of all independent schools, particularly those in schemes in which they benefit from taxpayers' money and, most important, all those on the admissible schools list. That can be done readily and easily.

The Minister ought to instruct the SCEA to put those local education authority boarding schools on the admissible schools list, particularly when it admits that they are often much better than the independent schools that are on the list already.

I have raised some important matters today, with which the Minister will want to deal with his usual care. The welfare of children and the quality of their education are of paramount importance. Independent schools operate in a wholly deregulated environment. There is virtually no reporting by Ofsted. The SCEA has no statutory obligation to inspect. There are no accounts for public scrutiny, the reports of social services departments are deregulated and schools can choose their own inspectors.

We need to give parents the ability to distinguish between the majority of good independent schools and the minority of poor schools. As history has instructed us, a deregulated environment is one in which the unscrupulous can thrive, mediocrity can flourish and—in the extreme—paedophiles can go undetected.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. It will not have escaped your notice that there are six hon. Members in the Chamber, four of whom have no choice in the matter—I am here only because a meeting was postponed for half an hour—and that five civil servants are present and being prevented from doing whatever they normally do in the Ministry of Defence on Wednesday mornings. That should be brought to the notice of the Select Committee on Procedure because I am afraid that it is not unique. I am in no way criticising the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), who has brought up an important and worthy matter. Can I have your assurance, Madam Deputy Speaker, that it will be brought to the attention of that Committee? I hate to contemplate what on earth the general public who see our proceedings will think about it.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): The number of people in the Chamber and the use of people's time are not matters for me. If the hon. Member feels strongly about it, he should discuss it directly with the Procedure Committee, but I remind him that there were lengthy debates before we embarked on this arrangement for Wednesday mornings.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): I very much take the point made by the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) about the number of hon. Members in the Chamber for this debate, but I do not think that that number reflects the debate's importance, which is very great, as the hon. Gentleman said. As we were told by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), the boarding school allowance costs more than £100 million a year, which averages out at about £9,000 per pupil involved in the scheme, and there are more than 11,000 pupils taking advantage of the allowance.

I think that it is important for the House to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport on having the initiative to raise this issue today. He has of course been persistent in his inquiries over many months. He has been hard working and diligent in these matters, and his speech revealed that invaluable sense of responsibility, which is enviable. His speech was tightly and very carefully argued, and it reflected his deep personal interest in these matters.

Hon. Members should recognise that my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport represents—as you do, Madam Deputy Speaker—a very large number of military personnel, and that he has an impeccable educational background, having been a teacher for many years and, indeed, a senior vice principal at a school in Plymouth. He has emphasised the fact that he has no general problems with the principle of the allowance; I echo that belief. We are not debating whether there should be a boarding school allowance—we are debating the quality of education with which the boarding school allowance is linked.

My hon. Friend has rightly drawn the House's attention to some major concerns and highlighted, I believe, some very disturbing facts that I know the Minister will deal with in his reply.

There is no doubt that the system of inspection of private schools requires careful scrutiny and attention. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport said in the final part of his speech that many independent schools are involved in the scheme that are of a very high character and in which a very good standard is achieved. But he has also said—the House should be troubled by this—that some schools involved in the scheme are, according to this week's article in The Times Educational Supplement, "dubious". When we bear in mind that £100 million of taxpayer's money has been used for the boarding school allowance, we must be very careful because the House is the guardian of the public purse.

Inspections of independent schools are generally too infrequent. Because of that lack of frequency, standards in those schools will inevitably be tested less frequently and will, therefore, be less reliable. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport told me that the Service Children's Education Authority has no right of entry to the schools on its admissible lists, and I think that that practice is wrong. I believe that the fact that Ofsted will now hold inspections only every five years is equally wrong. The combination of those two practices inevitably brings into doubt the quality of education provided by those schools to children of service personnel.

Schools that belong to the Headmasters' Conference are self-regulatory to a very large extent, of course, which we accept. But not all schools on the list belong to the Headmasters' Conference, and it was to those schools that my hon. Friend the Member for Devonport addressed his remarks.

The Minister will no doubt refer to the Bett report, although I believe that we will have a thorough debate on it later this year. That report mentions boarding school allowances and suggests that the payment rate mechanism is poor. The report states:

> "We suggest that the new system would be simpler to administer, and less open to any criticism that the mechanism currently used encourages some parents to send their children to less than adequate schools."

The admissible schools' list unquestionably needs overhauling. My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport said that the assisted places scheme—which is another matter, but it is interesting to compare the schemes—has a carefully created list for parents who want their children to take advantage of it. He also referred to state boarding schools. For the life of me, I cannot understand why state boarding schools which the Ministry of Defence believes offer high quality education should not be on the same list.

The Bett report refers to a need "for tighter quality control". Paragraph 18 of the report says:

> "We feel strongly that there should be tighter 'quality control' as far as MOD money spent on boarding schools is concerned, not least so that Service children can be certain of receiving, as far as is possible, a good standard of education. The approved list of boarding schools maintained by the MOD does not constitute any reliable certification of quality since SCEA does not inspect independent schools, and schools are almost never removed from the list. The only requirement for inclusion on the list is of being registered with the Department for Education (DFE). On the other hand, we note that SCEA schools, like all schools in the maintained sector, are subject to the same four yearly inspection by OFSTED. We believe that for a school to be included on the MOD approved list it should be subject either to this OFSTED inspection regime or to an alternative, equivalent inspection regime recognised as such by the MOD and the DFE. There should also be a clear procedure for removal from the approved list in the event of unsatisfactory reports from the Inspectors."

I believe that that final point is crucial.

In general, the Labour party is very much of the view that the schools on which the Ministry of Defence spends £100 million should be much more carefully and tightly inspected. In general, Labour also agrees with the recent personnel policy guidelines, which states:

> "We aim to ensure . . . that allowances enable service personnel to undertake the duties required of them without incurring unreasonable personal costs, taking into account conditions prevailing in civilian life."

The House will also be aware that the numbers of boarders in this country has declined in the past 10 or 20 years by 10,000 or 20,000 and that, although 25 per cent. of our Army is still in Germany, the number of armed service personnel who can look forward to a more stable family existence is likely to increase. The consequence of those two trends means that, for parents in the MOD, the need for boarding schools is likely to be a less significant factor. It was also interesting that a survey undertaken by those involved with the Bett report showed that only one half of parents in the armed services with children at boarding schools would have chosen boarding schools as their first choice. That statistic also demonstrates the likely change in society in the next few years.

The Bett report proposes changes not only to school inspection and quality control but to the payment system and to eligibility. The report says that there are too many exemption clauses, allowing the boarding school allowance to be used when it is unnecessary and costly. I think that there is a very strong case for examining those exemption clauses and for doing away with many of them because, in certain circumstances, the boarding school allowance is unnecessary and, therefore, a waste of taxpayers' money.

We believe that, as the Bett report says, the rules should be tightened so that only those families that are genuinely mobile are eligible for the scheme.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport also spoke about the need for advice, which I think is crucial. I really wonder whether the advice to parents that is given verbally is good enough. I think that that advice should be given at unit level so far as is practicable and not simply by circulars being sent to parents who are considering taking advantage of the scheme.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I apologise for not being in the Chamber at the beginning of the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I was in the Defence Select Committee. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether the Labour party will retain this allowance or whether—because of what he has already said in this debate—the Labour party's intention is to phase it out slowly or to make it more restrictive?

Mr. Murphy: As the hon. Gentleman said, he was not present when I began my speech. I made it clear that we do not disagree with the principle of the boarding school allowance and that it will continue under a Labour Government. We are saying that the recommendations of the Bett report, which has yet to be debated in the House but which, in this connection, seems to be highly sensible, are such that the Labour party could approve them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Devonport has rendered considerable service to parents in the Army, Navy and Air Force by bringing this important matter to the attention not only of the House but of the country. I am sure that the Minister of State will be able to deal with the various points raised in this interesting debate.

11.50 am

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Nicholas Soames): I congratulate the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) on securing this Adjournment debate on what is clearly an extremely important issue. He made a measured and balanced speech until perhaps the final sentence when he said that deregulation led to mediocrity and, as I understood it, to what my late lamented friend Geoffrey Dickens used to call "phaedopiles". My experience is to look at deregulation the other way around. Clearly, there will be casualties in deregulation as in any aspect of life, whether in the public or private sector, but deregulation has, by and large, led to a great expansion of enterprise, competition and excellence. The hon. Gentleman unbalanced what had been an admirable speech by a rather foolish conclusion.

The House should be aware that the hon. Gentleman's interest in defence—he represents an area with such a distinguished history of loyal and dedicated service—is matched by the fact that, as a former teacher, he has a long-expressed interest in education standards in the independent sector and, correctly in my view—I applaud him for it—in the need to ensure that the Ministry of Defence gets the value for money that it should for the £107 million that it spends annually on the boarding school allowance. The hon. Gentleman has raised the matter on the Floor of the House a number of times and in written questions to me. He is therefore well qualified to raise the matter again this morning.

As Minister of State for the Armed Forces, responsible for the welfare and deployment of service men and women and for almost every other aspect of their lives, I share the hon. Gentleman's concern that this particular aspect of their lives should be satisfactory. I am therefore glad of the opportunity to respond to the points that he raised. "Allegations" is the wrong word—let us say that the hon. Gentleman raised a number of points about various schools. I shall be writing to him in detail about them as I do not have the necessary facts to answer them, especially his final point relating to a school which, I understand, has left the trade association. I shall have that investigated at once, and I am grateful to him for letting me know about it. I shall write to him about the specific matters that he raised with which I am unable to deal now.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of extremely interesting points, and I listened with great care to what he had to say. I found much of what he said persuasive and I understand his genuine concern, which we share in every aspect of defence business, to ensure not only that the Ministry of Defence achieves best value for taxpayers' money but, just as important, that service children receive the best possible education.

I pay tribute to the work of service schools, which are splendid. Indeed, in my discussions with officials this morning while being briefed for this debate, it was said that many of the schools are excellent. I know from my own experience of visiting units all over the world that service men and women greatly value the education that their children receive. I also pay tribute to all the teachers and administrators who do so much to provide such an admirable service for the children of our service men and women.

I assure the hon. Gentleman and others that my Department shares the hon. Gentleman's aims—indeed, it would be like condemning motherhood and apple pie not to do so. The hon. Gentleman raised some important issues that need further investigation. I shall be in touch with him about them and would like him to come to see me to talk about them.

Although we are committed to devoting as much as possible to the business of the front line, we are of course mindful of our wider responsibilities. Although the provision of the boarding school allowance in these times of reduced defence budgets may seem odd to people who do not understand the principle, the scheme is soundly based. I acknowledge that what the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) said was not a criticism of the boarding school allowance per se but of the way in which it is handled.

The policy is soundly based. Not everyone realises how important such an allowance is to the otherwise turbulent side of family life for service men and women. It may be helpful, therefore, if I set out for the benefit of the House a little of the background to the issues raised today.

I am sure that we all agree that our highly trained and professional men and women are the armed forces' greatest asset and that it is essential that we look after their interests, not only to ensure that morale remains high, although that is critical, but because we are more likely to retain these admirable people in the forces if they feel that their needs and those of their families are properly met and fettled.

Service life places incomparable pressures on the family. Too few civilians—those who have never had any connection with the forces—understand that service men and women are not the same as civilians. Service personnel may be invited to make the ultimate sacrifice. They are not ordinary people, and I take this opportunity to pay my own very warm tribute to the families of all personnel in the armed forces. Without their support and tolerance, undoubtedly our armed forces would not function so effectively. The understanding and support that service wives give to their husbands, and vice versa, is crucial to the effectiveness of our forces. However, we cannot and will not take, and never have taken, that support for granted.

The welfare of one's family is one of the most important motivations in seeking any career. The services are clearly no exception—indeed, they are a shining example. Given the pressures that service families so often face, it is even more important to ensure that service personnel are confident that the welfare of their families is guaranteed. By doing that, we achieve value for money as we retain important people with specialised expertise in whom we have invested valuable training resources and who have such exceptional experience to give to the service of their Queen and country.

The provision of the boarding school allowance is one of the ways in which the needs of our service personnel are met. The allowance is available to service parents of all ranks to provide a stable education for their children in the face of the turbulence that is often a feature of service life. Service personnel who follow the flag and move their families wherever they are required to serve are eligible to receive it. Many of the service people most affected by turbulence are high achievers. Therefore, although the boarding school allowance is a cost to the Department, it is an extremely important tool in helping to persuade highly trained and vital service personnel to stay in the forces—something that we are very conscious of the need to do better across the board.

Because of your interest in defence, Madam Deputy Speaker, you are aware that service personnel and their families can be posted to various parts of the United Kingdom and overseas. Some of these postings are to isolated locations where adequate educational facilities are sometimes simply not available. Postings often occur at highly irregular intervals and sometimes at very short notice—such is the lot of service families. Depending on the service, postings last on average for two years. That could result in frequent and disruptive school change for children required to accompany their parents.

The availability of the boarding school allowance allows personnel of all ranks who suffer such turbulence the opportunity, if they so wish, to maintain their children in boarding schools. Children thus spend a substantial time at one school, which provides the continuity that is so important in education and which would otherwise be missing.

Boarding education is confined mainly to the independent sector, as only a small number of schools in the state sector offer boarding facilities. The provision of assistance with the fees enables service personnel to provide their children with the continuity offered by a boarding education. The boarding school allowance is not an education subsidy to allow service personnel access to a superior education—many state schools provide an education that is every bit as good as that provided by schools in the independent sector—but a contribution towards the average cost of a boarding education.

Mr. Jamieson: Does the Minister accept that local education authority boarding schools that are deemed to be excellent should be included on the admissible schools list, and that listed independent schools that are found to have shortcomings should be removed from it?

Mr. Soames: I do not agree with that proposition. The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of very important points this morning. I shall consider his comments and perhaps he and I can discuss them officially after I have raised them with the Department for Education and Employment.

Those who wish their children to attend the more expensive boarding schools will have to pay a substantial proportion of the fees. The maximum rate of boarding school allowance that may be claimed is set at 75 per cent. of the average fees of all those schools attended by at least 30 children of service personnel. The rate is currently £1,883 per term for children at junior schools and £2,248 per term for children at senior schools. Parents are required to contribute a minimum of 10 per cent. of the school fees, although a large number pay considerably more than that. The average level of school fees in the independent sector is £3,415 per term according to the independent schools information service. Service parents who send their children to an "average" school must therefore find £1,200 out of their own pockets for each child, each term.

As with parents everywhere, service parents are responsible for selecting an appropriate school to suit the needs of their children. In order to find the right school, some parents will seek to stabilise their families in an area of their choice and serve unaccompanied when required to do so. Some elect to move their children around with them, and most children cope successfully with several changes of school. I find that amazing and I am always impressed by how well such children manage.

However, frequent changes of school may be harmful to children's education. Some have little alternative but to attend boarding school. That group is relatively small: of a service population of some 231,000, only about 7,500—about 3.2 per cent.—claim boarding school allowance. As the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) pointed out, that number has reduced by more than 30 per cent. in the past five years as a result not only of draw-down in the armed forces but of control measures put in place to restrict the allowance to those who are genuinely affected by turbulence.

The hon. Member for Devonport is concerned that some parents elect to send their children to schools that do not perform well academically or that have been criticised in other areas. The Ministry of Defence has no statutory authority to control the educational standards of schools attended by children whose parents are in receipt of boarding school allowance—that responsibility rests with the Department for Education and Employment. However, the Ministry of Defence is keen to ensure that parents receive good advice about their selection of schools.

The Service Children's Education Agency—a new agency established on 1 April this year—has assumed the responsibility previously exercised by the Service

Children's Education Authority to provide general education advice to parents. In order to achieve that aim, it will continue to maintain close links with DFEE, OFSTED and other relevant professional bodies. It will also visit schools attended by a large number of children of service personnel, or when concerns are expressed about a school, in order to monitor the quality of accommodation and of pastoral care.

The Ministry of Defence maintains a list of schools for which parents may claim boarding school allowance. A copy of that list is kept in the Library. Prior to 1 April this year, the Service Children's Education Authority was responsible for checking that each school maintained adequate control over boarding facilities and met certain other basic criteria—including registration with the DFEE—before it was placed on the admissible schools list. That responsibility now rests with the Service Children's Education Agency.

Schools must be registered with the DFEE in accordance with the Education Act 1994 and must attain, and maintain, an acceptable standard of education as required by that Department. Before initial registration, a school is inspected by one of Her Majesty's inspectors and standards are monitored subsequently through "light touch" inspections carried out by the Office for Standards in Education, examining standards of achievement, teaching, learning and welfare. It is intended that those inspections be carried out every five years approximately, or more often when a school gives cause for concern. I shall discuss the hon. Gentleman's points on that subject with the Department for Education and Employment.

When standards are considered to be unsatisfactory in respect of unsuitable or inadequate accommodation, a failure to provide efficient and suitable education, or the existence of an unsuitable proprietor or teacher, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment issues a notice of complaint. That gives the school a specified period—usually six months—in which to improve in those areas where it was considered to be failing. If the school fails to comply within the notice period, it will be struck off the register and compelled to close, at which time it would no longer be eligible to remain on the Ministry of Defence list of admissible schools. When Ofsted reports are published about particular schools, the Service Children's Education Agency ensures that they are made available to parents with children at those schools. I noted the hon. Gentleman's point about reports and I shall consider that matter.

As to the question of the distribution of funds, the Service Children's Education Agency does not distribute funds to schools. Boarding school allowance is paid to service personnel to allow them to choose the most appropriate school for their children. The agency makes as much information as possible available to parents in order to help to inform their choice. We are constantly looking for ways of improving the quality of the information that we provide, and some of the hon. Gentleman's points are worthy of consideration in that regard.

The independent review—mentioned by the hon. Member for Torfaen—of the armed forces manpower, career and remuneration structures conducted recently by Sir Michael Bett was tasked with making recommendations to adapt those structures to the foreseeable needs of the next century. Its work on remuneration structures included an examination of all allowances paid to service personnel, paying particular attention to those factors of service life that created a need for them.

It concluded that, because of the unusually high level of mobility in the services—particularly in the Army—there is a continuing need to ensure that service personnel have the opportunity to provide their children with continuity of education through a boarding education. The provision of proper education for children is clearly a strong imperative for all parents, and the independent review concluded that it may not be possible for the services to retain personnel who feel unable to meet their aspirations in that regard.

Bett recognised that there is a continuing need for a form of boarding school allowance. The review made a number of recommendations to target the overall education allowance package better in order to ensure that only those with a genuine liability to move are entitled to benefit. The recommendations are being examined, together with all of the independent review's other recommendations, and I shall announce the results of the study later this year. Following a meeting this morning, I am pleased to report to the House that the work is going extremely well.

One factor that clearly influences the future cost of the boarding school allowance is the extent to which we are able to offer stability to service personnel and to their families. That will depend largely upon the operational demands that are placed on the individual services in the future.

The hon. Member for Devonport is right to raise those issues in circumstances where public funds are involved. As the hon. Member for Torfaen said, the hon. Gentleman has been extremely diligent in pursuing the matter in the past few years and I am grateful for his interest. As a former teacher, he will be well aware of the importance of maintaining and improving educational standards. The Government and the Ministry of Defence are committed to achieving the highest possible standards in education.

While the Ministry of Defence has no statutory power to regulate schools in the independent sector, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing his concerns to my attention on the Floor of the House. I shall pass them on to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and, having discussed them, I shall be happy to meet the hon. Gentleman, should he so desire, to explore the matters in greater detail.

The hon. Gentleman has raised important matters touching upon the welfare and morale of service men and women who are posted all over the world and I have no doubt that we shall have further discussions in future. I am grateful to him for raising the matter. We have had a thoroughly worthwhile and useful debate.

European Civil Air Transport

12.9 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I am grateful for the opportunity to open a debate on competition in European civil air transport. For months, indeed years, I have sought such a debate in Government time as the Government's policy of civil air transport liberalisation has been a great success story for the travelling public, the airlines, airline-related industries and the British economy, through the creation of employment and the healthy, positive contribution that British airlines make to the United Kingdom balance of payments.

Although a parliamentary pas de deux with my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London is always entertaining, the subject merits wider parliamentary participation and a debate lasting longer than 30 minutes. It seems that good fortune is mine today as, with your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we may have more than the expected time, but I see no other hon. Members wishing to join what is likely to be a pas de deux.

The transfer of British Airways into the private sector was one of the flagship privatisations of my noble Friend Lady Thatcher's first term of office. The restructuring of the airline without state aid from 1981 to 1983 under the inspired stewardship of that dynamic duo, Lord King and Sir Colin Marshall, set a standard for competitive achievement that is the envy of Europe and laid the foundation for British Airways' current position as a global force with strategic alliances in the Pacific basin through its stake in Qantas, in the Americas through its stake in US Air and in Europe through its stakes in TAT and Deutsche BA. It has also enjoyed a dominant pivotal position because of its primary location at Heathrow at the heart of Europe—if I may use that phrase. Heathrow is the world's premier international airport and the principal gateway to our continent from north America. British Airways notably survived the past air transport recession profitably when other private sector airlines were going under and a number of state carriers were sustained by national subsidies.

There are, of course, other striking British air transport success stories. If I name but a few, I am seeking not to be invidious but only to avoid taking up too much time. British Midland, whose competitive achievements in domestic scheduled services and in opening up European routes with affordable fares while providing a high-quality service, has been a remarkable success. Virgin Atlantic is clearly a highly original and enterprising airline, unafraid to take on the big boys, including British Airways. Air UK's development of services out of Stansted has been successful and has been thoroughly beneficial to that airport. The inclusive tour and charter sector is also vigorous in Britain, with carriers such as Britannia and Monarch.

Britain is in the vanguard of air transport liberalisation in Europe but is subject to state subsidised competition from nationalised continental carriers. That is in gross breach of the spirit, if not the technical letter, of the treaty of Rome. It is also an affront to the single integrated European market which, for most British people, is the principal purpose of the United Kingdom's participation in the European Union.

Subsidies to airlines take various forms, including operational grants, direct subsidies and indirect financial assistance. Examples include capital injections, debt write-offs, fare subsidies and favourable tax treatments as well as less visible forms of state support which none the less favour national flag carrying airlines.

Under article 92 of the treaty of Rome

"any aid granted by a Member State or through state resources in any form whatsoever which distorts or threatens to distort competition by favouring certain undertakings or the production of certain goods, shall, insofar as it affects trade between Member States, be incompatible with the common market."

In some circumstances, state aid is permissible to assist deprived areas to facilitate the development of certain economic activities if it does not distort trading conditions and, in "exceptional circumstances", if the Council of Ministers agrees unanimously.

The definition of the phrase "exceptional circumstances" is crucial, and Iberia, for example, claims that the recent devaluation of the peseta is such a circumstance. The interpretation of the rules on state aid for airlines has changed recently. The previous understanding was that major subsidies which would otherwise have been forbidden might be allowed on a "one-time, last-time" basis, with the aid to be used to allow the airline to become self-financing thereafter. I call that the drunken sailor syndrome. It has worked out as "one last drink" for state carriers such as Air France and Iberia.

Brussels, however, has made it clear that from 1 April 1997 it will seek to ban state aid to airlines for anything other than "exceptional and unforeseen" crises. When aid takes the form of a financial injection, it is normally subject to an investigation under article 93(2) of the treaty of Rome. States are meant to inform the Commission in advance under article 93(3). The Commission itself—for transport aid, Directorate-General VII—is responsible for investigating such aid and deciding whether it is compatible with the exceptions allowed under the treaty.

The Commission's approach to aviation state aid is set out in its guidelines, that were published in 1984 and 1994. There are two main elements to its evaluation. First, it considers whether a state injection into an airline is actually state aid. Under the market economy investor principle, an injection is an aid in terms of the treaty only if it is apparent that a private shareholder in analogous circumstances would not have made a comparable investment.

If the investment is deemed to be aid, the Commission proceeds to consider it in the light of exceptions, particularly that set out in article 92(3)(c). DG VII interprets that exception as permitting restructuring aid so long as it is transparent, facilitates a viable restructuring plan and does not transfer the recipient's difficulties to its competitors. There lies the rub.

In the past five years, the Commission has investigated a number of state aid cases of civil air transport. I shall list some of them. In 1991, Sabena received £584 million in state aid—that is sterling not ecu. That was approved. Air France received £665 million, and that too was approved. In 1992, Iberia received a grant of £670 million, which was approved. In 1993, Air France applied for £170 million, but that case was rejected. That was the only rejection on the list. In 1993, Aer Lingus received state aid of £170 million which was approved. In 1994, TAP Air Portugal's grant of £710 million was approved, as was Olympic Airways' grant of £995 million, and Air France received £2.4 billion, also with EC approval. In 1996, under the eagle eye of Commissioner Kinnock, Iberia received state aid of £460 million and that was approved under the market economy investor principle. We shall see how that works out. In other words, the flag carriers of six European Union member states out of 15 have between them received £6.364 billion of state aid over the past five years. Forty per cent. of EU states have received that grotesquely large amount of state subsidy—and some, such as Air France and Iberia, have repeatedly come back for more.

In July 1994, the European Commission approved state aid to Air France of 20 billion francs—about £2.4 billion—to fund a so-called restructuring plan, to be paid in three instalments. Concern at that decision prompted a number of European economic area airlines, notably led by British Airways, to mount a legal challenge before the European Court in the first instance. British Midland has brought a separate case. The UK Government, to their credit, have intervened formally to support the airlines—as have Sweden, Denmark and Norway. The cases are likely to be heard this year, probably in the autumn. The UK Government have also applied directly to the European Court to have the Commission's decision annulled. I applaud that intervention, as I did the intervention in respect of bovine spongiform encephalopathy yesterday. The Government's case has been stayed at our request pending the outcome of the airlines' own cases.

The Commission approved the second instalment of state aid to Air France in 1995 and is due to consider this year whether the third and final instalment should be approved.

The Spanish Government have sought approval for further state aid to Iberia totalling 130 billion pesetas, which is £688 million. The Commission's decision of 31 January approved an immediate injection of £460 million and left the door open for a further 20 billion pesetas of state aid—£106 million—in 1997, provided that certain cost savings and productivity improvements are made. Those payments are to be allowed under the market economy investor principle, but how that is applied will be crucial to the credibility of Commissioner Kinnock and the organisation that he represents. I have a particular interest because of my interest in Latin America. Iberia has been using state subsidies to fund its investments in carriers in Latin America, such as Aerolineas Argentinas and Ladeco in Chile. I understand that those stakes are to be reduced or liquidated; nevertheless, those investments have been permitted by the Commission.

The House may find it noteworthy and instructive to know some of the arguments that British Airways has rightly been advancing in making its case against the proposed latest tranche of aid to Iberia, which have been supported by independent aviation consultants Avmark International—which undertook detailed analysis of Iberia's so-called exceptional circumstances. British Airways' key points, in addition to universally applicable arguments against the payment of state aid to our competitors, are that this is the second occasion on which state aid has been requested for Iberia, and it falls within the period of the restructuring plan that accompanied the first tranche of state aid of 120 billion pesetas in 1992. To allow a further capital injection would violate the so-called "one-time, last-time" principle that has heretofore governed the payment of state aid to carriers in the European Union.

If one analyses the four reasons given by the Spanish authorities to justify further state aid, one realises that they cannot be classified as exceptional circumstances unforeseen and external to the company. First, Iberia claims that the Gulf war and the recession have affected all airlines, and that argument was also used to justify the 1992 capital injection. It is a long time since the Gulf war and certain carriers, particularly British Airways—which lost an aircraft at the outset of the hostilities—have weathered all the difficulties. Secondly, Iberia cites currency depreciation, but that is an international fact of business life and probably had little negative effect on Iberia's finances. Thirdly, Iberia blames domestic liberalisation, but that was planned for many years and was much trumpeted by the European Union. There has been progress in that respect in Spain to some degree and in other countries to a much higher degree. Finally, Iberia refers to its Latin American strategy, which everybody who knew the market realised was a recipe for disaster as well as a waste of money for taxpayers in the UK and elsewhere in the EU.

If the European Commission cannot even regulate effectively the single market in civil air transport, how can it be allowed to negotiate air service agreements with third countries on behalf of member states?

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): The theme of my hon. Friend's remarks—I apologise for missing the start of his speech—is that such subsidies are like a vegetarian saying that he wants no nuts, tomato or mayonnaise in his diet, which is possible but highly unbelievable. My hon. Friend makes the point, much more eloquently than I can do, that the claim made by the Commission and the airlines that they are not really keen on state subsidies but use them out of necessity is nothing more than a pack of lies.

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend is more trenchant in his comments but, as usual, is highly perceptive. Like me, my hon. Friend has many constituents whose livelihoods depend on civil air transport and on a vigorous British air transport industry. The Government have been firm, but they must maintain their firm stance on behalf of British airlines against unfair competition.

I urge the Government to take a further step and to veto any arrogation unto itself by the European Union of the right to negotiate air service agreements on the UK's behalf. That entitlement and prerogative essentially appertain to a sovereign independent state. If we allow the EU to act in that way, the UK will lose its position as the dominant civil air transport power in Europe. We can be sure that rights that have previously been ours will be frittered away to the benefit of the French, Dutch and Germans, who also have important continental gateways. I hope that the Government will veto any extension of the Commission's costly incompetence in an area of vital British national interest.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I welcome the opportunity to say a few words in support of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on the important subject of civil air transport. Again and again over the years, we have seen a continental airline ask for money from its Government, and we have been told by the European Commission in Brussels that such aid will be a one-off payment and the last to the particular airline. On that basis, such aid has been allowed. Again and again, such support has been to the disadvantage essentially of British airlines that are much more commercially oriented, particularly since the privatisation of British Airways.

It goes a bit further than that. If air transport is to become more competitive, more commercial and give a better service to the customer throughout Europe, the only way forward is the way that has been pioneered by airlines in this country—airlines that are commercially viable and that are now the best in the world. Some continental airlines have seen the light. Lufthansa, for instance, is following the same route as British Airways, and that is to the advantage of Europe and customers throughout the European Union.

I also fully endorse the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood about the Commission having negotiating rights with the United States. Not only do continental airlines have to prove their commercial viability but the Commission that has to be made to understand that—before it can take on the responsibility, if it ever does, for negotiating air rights with the United States and other parts of the world on behalf of European Union countries—it too must be seen not to support those who wish to subsidise airlines in their countries.

I strongly believe that we should not give negotiating rights to the European Commission until it stops allowing states within the European Union to subsidise their own airlines. I would also like to see a clear situation in which we have time, after the subsidies have stopped, to see how those airlines perform before any thought is given to giving some of our own rights away to Brussels.

There is no doubt in my mind that there must be a limit to the way in which airlines that are in the public sector continue to receive subsidies. It is all very well to say that airlines in the private sector will be able to compete because they are more efficient, but the problem lies in the way in which some of the subsidised airlines operate. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood mentioned Iberia and it is a classic case. The subsidised airlines use subsidies, not for infrastructure improvement or to reduce the number of employees and stop overmanning, but to target routes and make it difficult for competitors to operate profitably on those routes in the hope of getting sufficient market share to push competitors off those routes. That is the wrong approach and it will result in profitable airlines being unable to offer the service that they can at the moment and in those airlines that are not profitable asking for more subsidies to fly routes that were not profitable in the first place.

One of the lessons from the British Airways experience was that it considered its route structure 10 or 15 years ago. It considered all routes, however historic they may have been, and decided whether they were profitable. It cut the routes that were not profitable and cut the number of its employees in half in the process. It created a profitable airline as a result of the hard decisions that it took some 10 years ago. British Airways was then able to build up those routes again, and made routes that previously were unprofitable, profitable and in the process employed more people. British Airways now has twice the route network in miles flown, but it employs the same number of people. That must be the way ahead for state airlines such as Air France and Iberia, rather than attempts to prop up an existing unprofitable, uncommercial structure with continuing amounts of state aid.

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) for giving us the opportunity of this debate today. When he introduced the debate, at a rather unexpected hour, I thought that I perceived a note of mild and customarily gentlemanly disappointment in his voice at the thought that he and I would execute a pas de deux this morning. As an Under-Secretary, I declare myself on this occasion an unsatisfactory substitute. I assure my hon. Friend that, although on this occasion we are using the device of an Adjournment debate and although my noble Friend Viscount Goschen is the Minister for Aviation and Shipping, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport takes the issue that my hon. Friend raised today extremely seriously. As I say, I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the subject and for expressing himself in such a clear and, if I may say so, trenchant fashion.

We also enjoyed an unexpected but none the less immensely pleasurable minor explosion from my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), who, although he is a parliamentary private secretary for a Transport Minister, was obviously speaking in a private constituency capacity. It would be a shame to lose him. We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans). My hon. Friends who have spoken are all characterised by the fact that they have taken an interest for many years in the subject. Heathrow is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington, and my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre has long had an interest in aviation matters. I do not believe that there is an hon. Member who has been clearer about his interest in the issue of European state aid than my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood.

Some £56 billion of United Kingdom visible trade passed through British airports in 1994. Each year, expenditure by air travellers visiting the UK, and by foreign passengers on UK airlines, totals nearly £10 billion. Total employment in airlines and airports within the UK is estimated at over 100,000. Air transport is a major industry, and a substantial UK success story, which fully deserves the attention of the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood will know that the Government, as he suggested, are firmly committed to competition in aviation, because competition is good for our airlines, good for our airports, good for the UK economy, and good for users. It is because we are convinced of the benefits of competition that the Government have long championed the cause of aviation liberalisation in Europe. The liberal bilateral agreements that the UK reached with Germany and the Netherlands in 1984, with Luxembourg and Belgium in 1985, and with Ireland in 1988, gave impetus to the momentum towards liberalisation throughout the European Community. The UK was instrumental in promoting and concluding the series of legislative measures, culminating in the so-called third package, which created the single market in aviation in Europe.

The single European market in aviation has formally existed since 1 January 1993. On international services within the Community, the third package opened up access to all Community carriers. Member states must use the same criteria when issuing licences on grounds of safety and financial fitness. Member states can no longer favour their national carriers by issuing licences on a discretionary basis, and restrictions on cross-border investment have been removed.

Fares, frequency and capacity are now decided by airlines according to commercial principles, instead of being regulated by member states, subject only to safeguards against anti-competitive practices. The pattern of services can respond freely to changes in the pattern of demand. High-cost carriers can no longer rely on market protection from Governments to ward off more efficient and innovative competitors.

The only remaining restrictions apply on domestic services, and until 1 April 1997 member states may prohibit access to airlines registered in other member states. But that final barrier to access will be lifted in less than 12 months' time. All Community carriers will then be free to compete on all international and all domestic services within the Community. National carriers will no longer have the advantage of protection on busy internal routes from their major Community competitors. Competition will be further enhanced on international routes that are fed by those domestic services. The elimination of the final vestiges of regulated market access will present new commercial opportunities for UK airlines, which they are well placed to exploit with their experience of operating in the private sector.

European liberalisation has already brought pronounced benefits both to users and to efficient airlines. In both international and domestic markets, liberalisation has helped to trigger significant increased competition. For example, 43 new routes are being served, and 38 routes are now supporting an increased number of competitors. I am pleased to say that about a third of the new routes are within or to the United Kingdom.

Customers enjoy wider choice and lower fares. Small independent airlines now have a genuine opportunity to compete by differentiating their product in terms of price and quality. The larger flag carriers that are the target of the increased competition benefit indirectly as the pressures of open competition breed a more commercial attitude and greater efficiency, making them more competitive in the world market. It is true that on some Community routes fares remain higher than users might like to see them. But providing air transport is a high-risk, capital-intensive operation and competitive services may take some time to emerge. The legislative framework within which competition can flourish is in place. We can look forward with confidence to increasing benefits from liberalisation as time passes.

Even in domestic markets, where so far only home-registered carriers have been entitled to compete, the third package has had a number of beneficial effects. In Spain, Iberia's dominance of the Madrid-Barcelona route has been challenged successfully by two small airlines, Air Europa and Spanair. Iberia's share of the domestic Spanish market has fallen from 100 per cent. in 1992 to below 80 per cent. now. In France, Air Liberté has taken on Air Inter on the Orly-Toulouse and other internal routes, with resulting falls in business and economy fares.

I stress again that it is the United Kingdom that has led the way in encouraging free and fair competition. It is instructive and encouraging that the UK register boasts more privately owned international airlines than any other member state. From BA and British Midland down to the smallest company, each makes an important contribution to the wealth of the UK. They flourish because of the Government's pro-competitive and liberalising policies. They are carrying the message into the heartlands of their competitors, with companies such as Deutsche BA in Germany and TAT in France.

In 1987, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said, we privatised British Airways. Today, as my hon. Friend observed, thanks to Lord King and Sir Colin Marshall, British Airways is widely recognised as about the most successful and profitable airline in Europe. By any standards, it is a major player on the global aviation scene. It has been the model for other European major carriers to follow. Moreover, British Airways has created jobs. As my hon. Friends know, the conventional wisdom in some European countries was that flag-carrying airlines had to be owned by the state and financed by it, to protect employment. British Airways has shown that that proposition was crassly erroneous. In the private sector, BA has increased its work force by about 35 per cent. over the past 10 years. As a result, it is employing more people than before privatisation, but at much higher levels of productivity.

It is worth saying that BA—the same can be said about British Midland, Virgin, Air UK and other operators—has achieved its pre-eminence without a penny of state aid or subsidy from the taxpayer. The BA example is clearly, however, the most spectacular. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for saying that state aid remains the greatest single threat to effective implementation of the single market.

State aid to national airlines has been an integral part of the aviation scene in several European countries for many years, yet it is entirely incompatible with the competitive regime that member states collectively have now established. If there is to be a genuine free market in air transport, the Community must put an end to the injection of public subsidies. They distort competition and penalise efficient carriers in countries that do not provide state aid. They perpetuate inefficiency and discourage innovation, to the detriment of passengers and business. There is no reason why taxpayers should subsidise airlines which, because of their inefficiencies, cannot survive in the marketplace.

As the House knows, the treaty of Rome puts the onus on the European Commission to control state aid. Over many years, we have been pressing the Commission to take a tougher approach towards member states that wish to continue paying outmoded state subsidies. Under the treaty, other member states have only limited powers to influence the Commission's decisions. The UK, however, has taken every opportunity to do what it can to ensure that state subsidies become a thing of the past. I can assure the House that we shall not weaken our efforts.

We have demonstrated our resolve, as my hon. Friend was kind enough to say, to tackle those issues head on by taking the Commission to the European Court over its decision in 1994 to allow the French Government to pay a £2.4 billion subsidy to Air France. Several European airlines, including British Airways and British Midland, have also challenged the decision. For the information of the House, the Government's case is currently stayed at our request, pending the outcome of the airlines' case. The Government had intervened in support of the airlines, and we hope that hearings will begin this year.

[Mr. Steve Norris]

The Air France decision represented a major threat to liberalisation and to the interests of UK airlines. It was a massive injection of funds, equivalent at the time of the decision to about 60 per cent. of BA's market capitalisation. Aid on that scale could damage the European air transport industry for years to come.

United Kingdom airlines compete head on with Air France on several routes. They will be severely disadvantaged if Air France can reduce its prices or improve its quality of service as a result of state aid. United Kingdom airlines have to develop their networks out of their own resources. Air France's ability to maintain a wider range of services than it would without subsidy deprives efficient airlines of the commercial opportunities that they are entitled to expect.

Air France produced a restructuring plan to accompany the request for aid. We have grave doubts whether the plan can succeed. It was not based on cost reductions of the sort or on a scale that a loss-making private sector airline would put in hand. On the contrary, Air France intended to purchase a substantial number of new aircraft. That itself was unnecessary, and would have utilised funds that might have reduced the effect of the aid that was sought. A loss-making private sector airline would have to focus on its core activities if it wanted to achieve viability. The Commission's decision did not ensure that Air France financed as much of its proposed restructuring as possible by disposing of non-core assets, which is the obvious route that a private sector operation would take.

All in all, our view was that the Commission made a thoroughly bad decision, apparently without due consideration. We look to the courts to rectify the situation. Meanwhile, we are maintaining the pressure. Air France has realised its investment in Sabena and postponed some of its aircraft orders since the aid was approved. We have pressed the Commission to take that into account in deciding whether final payment of all the aid is justified.

The recent Commission decision to approve a £460 million payment to Iberia is the latest in a long line of disappointing decisions. The Iberia case is not directly comparable with that of Air France. The funding is not on such an immense scale, although it is still very large. Largely for geographical reasons, the immediate commercial threat to UK airlines is not so great. As the Commission has decided that the payment to Iberia is justified as a commercial investment by the Spanish Government as a shareholder, the case raises different issues.

The Commission says that the approved funding is not state aid. The effect, however, will be the same—to shore up an inefficient company and to distort consumer choice. It is the second large payment to Iberia—my hon. Friend drew attention to an extraordinarily large catalogue of payments—over four years. As my hon. Friend said, £670 million was approved in 1992. We are now faced with the latest payment. It is unfair to airlines such as British Airways, British Midland and other UK carriers that compete without subsidy.

We are especially concerned about the possible precedent that could be set for other state-owned airlines that might seek capital injections in future. We could not tolerate a situation in which state aid was allowed to pass when dressed up as commercial investment, thereby circumventing the Commission's powers to disallow state aid under the treaty. That would undermine all our efforts to close the door on aviation subsidies. The Government have made clear to the Commission their views on that decision, and we are looking closely at its text to see what further options are open to us. My hon. Friend may be assured that the Government will act in whatever way is best to protect the long-term interests of the UK's aviation industry and, indeed, in a way that best promotes our objective of eliminating altogether state subsidies to airlines.

It is worth putting it on the record that not only state aid is a threat to liberalisation. As a few minutes remain, I shall, with my hon. Friend's indulgence, refer to one or two areas where it will be equally important to ensure that appropriate arrangements are in place. My hon. Friends will be aware of the importance, for example, of airport slots. It is unlikely that the growth in transport across the Community will be able to keep pace with the increasing demand for air travel, so congested airports will be increasingly common. We must ensure a fair and efficient system for managing airport capacity if the benefits of the liberalised market are to be realised.

Heathrow and Gatwick are respectively the first and fifth busiest airports for international traffic in the European Union, so the UK's airports have had a head start in developing processes for the allocation of take-off and landing slots. European law has already established the principle of a slot co-ordinator who is independent of airlines and the airport itself. It also gives preferential access for new-entrant airlines into the most congested airports, especially airlines that are willing to compete on monopoly or duopoly intra-Community routes.

The existing EC regulation is now due for review, and the United Kingdom Government are taking an active role in that process. Given the experience of three years' operation of the regulation, we are stressing the need first and foremost for its provisions to be properly implemented in every member state. In particular, that means that allocation decisions must be entirely free from interference by Government or any dominant airline.

We also believe that there is scope for the market to play a greater role in the distribution of slots. We acknowledge, of course, that a free-for-all auction would bring immense practical difficulties, but we are pressing for some trading of slots to be permitted between airlines once they have been allocated by the co-ordinator. That would tend to channel slots towards airlines that value them most, and strengthen the link between provision of services and consumer demand.

The second potential threat to liberalisation is air traffic control constraints, as delays add to the operating costs of airlines. Following UK proposals in the late 1980s, the European civil aviation conference launched initiatives to increase airspace capacity: through the establishment of European-wide flow management; by harmonising and integrating European air traffic management; and by increasing capacity in and around airports. In Europe, since 1990, air traffic control delays have halved in duration, while traffic has increased by an average of 5 per cent. a year. The United Kingdom wholeheartedly supports those initiatives.

Restrictions on the provision of ground handling services at Community airports are another potential brake on liberalisation. At some airports, monopolies run by the airport authority or the dominant carrier provide inefficient or unduly costly services. We have therefore been a strong supporter of moves to open up the ground handling market.

We are pleased that the Community is close to adopting legislation to end monopoly arrangements and require all larger airports to permit potential suppliers of ground handling services to compete for contracts with airlines. Airlines will also have the right to carry out their own handling. Although the implementation of those measures will be phased in over a longer period than the United Kingdom would have preferred, they represent a positive step, to remove harmful restrictions. Opening up the ground handling market will provide the United Kingdom and other Community airlines with competitively priced and more responsive services, and will enable them to pass on those benefits to their passengers.

The United Kingdom aviation industry, the UK economy as a whole and UK passengers benefit, as my hon. Friend said, from a fully liberalised market in aviation. The Government therefore favour extending the single market beyond the borders of the European Community to other European states. Already, Norway is part of the liberalised arrangements, and negotiations are under way with Switzerland. We have said that we support a further extension to embrace the countries of central and eastern Europe, which in due course will lead to further opportunities for United Kingdom airlines and greater choice for users.

Mr. Wilkinson: I welcome what my hon. Friend is saying about the Government's strong desire to see an extension of liberalisation throughout the European economic area and, I presume, all European civil aviation conference member countries' jurisdictions as well. However, would it not be utterly wrong if the European Union were to arrogate to itself the right to negotiate air service agreements on behalf of its member countries, because that would create a dual situation in Europe, which could lead only to conflict and be to the advantage of the European economic area countries rather than those that are, like ourselves—for the time being at any rate—members of the European Union?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend reminds me of the important point that he made in his speech about who would negotiate in relation to third countries. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and, indeed, his predecessors, are absolutely clear that it is appropriate for member states to continue to negotiate such matters unilaterally and that there is little to commend the proposition that services be negotiated at Community level by the Commission. I suggest that it is hard to determine the advantage, other than the theoretical advantage, which would accrue. The interests of member states, their relationship with third countries throughout the world, the history of that relationship, and the ties of language, tradition or custom may bind individual members of the Community, but there are areas that differ between member states. All that suggests that unilateral negotiation is infinitely preferred. My hon. Friend is right to make that point.

If the definition of subsidiarity is that the Commission shall do only that which the member state cannot better do itself, that proposition in relation to the negotiation of third-party agreements would appear to commend exactly my right hon. Friend's proposal, and I know that in due course he will wish to say more on that extremely important subject, where, sadly, our view and that of the Commission would appear to be at odds.

In conclusion, I merely repeat how pleased I have been to be able to debate this subject, however inadequately, with my hon. Friend. Some member states have not always been predisposed towards an open market in aviation, and the United Kingdom has a justifiably proud record in leading Europe down the path of liberalisation. The Community has made good progress in recent years in creating the legal framework for a single European aviation market, but opening up access to routes is simply not enough. We need to root out any obstacles to free and fair competition, and the greatest of those obstacles is state aid. The benefits of liberalisation will be seriously diluted if efficient airlines cannot fully exploit their competitive advantage because other carriers are bolstered by state handouts.

The Government look forward to the time when all member states accept that any form of state support to airlines is fundamentally inconsistent with the principle of the single market. United Kingdom airlines have prospered without receiving any form of state aid, despite facing unfair competition from airlines in member states that do. The Government are committed to seeing the end of those practices, and to seeing aviation services provided on a genuinely commercial basis.

I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us the opportunity to debate this important issue, and I hope that he will have observed, from the clarity with which I am able to put forward the Government's position, that we take the issue extremely seriously.

Probation Service (South Yorkshire)

12.59 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I sought this debate after meeting South Yorkshire probation officers about two weeks ago to discuss the operation of the service. I was accompanied by my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) and for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie). Since then, I have met probation officers to discuss subsequent developments.

Sir Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): I presume that that was a party caucus meeting; otherwise, I would have expected to be invited.

Mr. Clapham: It certainly was not. I thought that invitations had been distributed to Members from both main parties throughout South Yorkshire, and I am unable to elaborate on whether the hon. Gentleman received one—or, indeed, on why he did not receive one, if he did not.

It was clear from our discussion that the South Yorkshire probation service had responded positively to the challenges of recent years. I assume that the Minister has seen the service's annual report for 1994-95. If he has, he will have noted the increase in all aspects of probation work.

The number of pre-sentencing reports to the criminal courts has increased by nearly 15 per cent.; the supervision of offenders given community sentences has risen by 18 per cent., nearly twice the increase in 1993-94; there has been a 17 per cent. increase in the amount of automatic conditional release work; occupancy of bail hostels has risen by 10 per cent., and demand for welfare reports in the family courts has increased by 3.5 per cent. There has clearly been a dramatic rise in the work of the South Yorkshire probation service.

Impressive though those figures are, I must emphasise that the organisation aims not just to achieve numerical volume but to provide an efficient and effective service. What is not evident from the figures is the commitment to developing work programmes for specific groups of offenders that are intended to deal with certain types of offending behaviour. I think that the Minister will agree that that is an important development—a development that has taken place not just in South Yorkshire but throughout the probation service.

The South Yorkshire probation service's main function is the supervision of offenders on community orders, with the aim of preventing reoffending. In that way, the service makes a positive contribution to the community, ensuring public safety and strengthening ties. It works not in isolation, but in the community. Officers constantly interact with offenders who, while conscious of their actions, are not always conscious of the consequences of those actions. Those who have decided to change the qualifications for probation officers do not seem to have taken that on board.

Probation work is done in a social context. It is a complex process, often requiring the fixed ideas of offenders to be broken down so that they can be integrated and can live with others in harmony, without causing the problems that led to their initial contact with the probation service. Such a complex social process requires mature officers with good education and a good training; it requires the understanding that mature recruits bring to the job.

That understanding, however, needs to be underpinned by education and training of a high standard. I believe that the necessary educational qualifications should be gained in universities, which can provide theoretical knowledge that can then be linked to practical skills.

The South Yorkshire probation service feels that the abolition of the requirement for people to hold diplomas resulting from a two-year course in social work or its equivalent before they can be appointed as probation officers amounts to deskilling. I agree. I do not believe that the proposals for in-service training will provide the necessary combination of theory and practice. Even at this 11th hour, I ask the Minister to consider implementing a new two-year diploma course. If he cannot do so, he should at least be able to tell us that he is prepared to review the matter again with the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work.

I am aware that the National Association of Probation Officers referred the whole matter of training to a judicial review. That review did not fully support NAPO's contentions, but I understand that the judge said that there was now a void, and that there should be appropriate educational and training qualifications for probation officers. Perhaps the Minister will expand on that.

According to the Dewes report, which was commissioned by the Government, the diploma in social work inhibits the recruitment of potentially valuable probation officers. The figures show, however, that the service is not losing nationally or regionally: it is obtaining mature recruits. In 1993, more than 50 per cent. of recruits were over the age of 30, and more than 40 per cent. had previous work experience. Perhaps the real disincentive has been caused by the fact that, in 1994, the Government cut £17 million from the probation service's education budget, thus reducing the number of available places.

Why, the South Yorkshire probation service asks, do the Government want to dismantle the current system of education and training, which is supported by NAPO and the Association of Chief Officers of Probation? The Industrial Society found its training and recruitment methods very effective.

It would seem—no doubt the Minister will expand on this—from leaks in the media that the Government wish to dismantle the probation service qualification, so that they can recruit more ex-service men and women, in the belief that they will instil more discipline. If that is really their objective, it results from a mistaken view of the probation service's work—like the belief that recruits do not require theoretical knowledge.

I again draw the Minister's attention to the fact that probation officers work with drug addicts, with people who are responsible for sexual abuse, with people who have been involved in family violence as well as family breakdown, and with the mentally ill. There is a need for a great deal of understanding, and that comes from an educational qualification steeped in much of the theory that applies to social work. Such education, linked to practice on the job, can provide the necessary skills to enable a probation officer to work well in the community.

Another reason why the Government want to dismantle the probation service came to the fore in an announcement only a week or so ago. The Guardian carried the headline

"Probation Pay Linked to Crime". I do not know whether the Minister saw that article, but he will no doubt be aware of the proposal for a pay-related bonus system. Probation officers in South Yorkshire feel that that would devalue the service. As we are now aware, the Home Secretary seems to be seriously considering the introduction of what I would refer to as a ludicrous performance-related pay system, which is linked to whether a probation officer's clients reoffend.

That barmy idea was proposed for the police force and withdrawn. The work that a probation officer does, to which I have referred, is even more complex, and a pay-related system would lead to all kinds of problems. It is an absolutely ridiculous idea, and would result in probation officers recommending for supervision under community orders only offenders they judge are least likely to reoffend. That would be the obvious way to ensure that they would receive their bonuses.

Those people who had been to prison or had a record of reoffending would not be recommended for community service. The system will ultimately lead to reduced pay levels in the service, which will deter the high-calibre recruits currently joining it.

I ask the Minister to reflect on the system's ultimate results. Are we saying that judges will be on bonus-related pay, and that their payment by results will be related to the length of sentences they impose? If that increased, as it ultimately would, the prison population, would prison officers be paid more to supervise the rise in the prison population? If so, are we to say that they are likely to receive decreases in pay if the prisoners they have been supervising were to reoffend? On reflection, I am sure that the Minister will agree that introducing a bonus-related pay system in the probation service is ludicrous and barmy.

As I am sure the Minister will be aware, there has been a fall in recorded crime of 2 per cent. in South Yorkshire. Burglary overall has fallen by 11 per cent. There was a fall of 1 per cent. in violent crime, and there has been a fall of 10 per cent. in the number of sexual offences. Those figures reflect in part—I emphasise, in part—the effectiveness of the South Yorkshire probation service. I say "in part" because I am aware that other agencies are involved in those welcome statistics, such as the police and the social services.

The probation service approach to offenders really works. There is a mountain of evidence to support that contention, but I shall use only two examples.

A cost-benefit analysis of probation-style programmes in America showed that the net saving of such programmes was $68,000 per offence. A study in the United Kingdom in 1993 followed a group of young offenders who had taken part in an intensive probation programme and compared them with a group of offenders who had been given custodial sentences. It showed that the volume of reconvictions of those given custodial sentences was 100 per cent. higher than for those who had undertaken an intensive probation course. The probation service approach is successful.

The whole approach could be undermined by an inadequate training system and a barmy payment-by-results system. The probation officers in South Yorkshire are extremely concerned by the Government's proposals—or should I say lack of them—on adequate education and training. They feel that the service will be deskilled. Moreover, they are worried that the proposed payment-by-results system will devalue the service, and that the ultimate loser will be the community. I share those fears.

The Government's ill-conceived proposals will undermine the confidence of the professionals in the service and be to the detriment of the community. I therefore urge the Minister to think again, and to work with probation officers, chief probation officers and the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work to arrive at a satisfactory solution to the education issue. I urge him to drop the barmy idea of putting probation officers on a payment-by-results system.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): I welcome this opportunity to reply to the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), and I pay tribute to the South Yorkshire probation service and its work, and to the probation service as a whole.

We in government fully recognise the tremendous contribution that the probation service makes. The criminal justice system is clearly not all about prison. Many offenders, as the hon. Gentleman said, will very much benefit from a community sentence. That is central to our policy. We are very well aware that the probation service faces a greater and greater challenge, and I am glad to say that its overall resources have remained in real terms at a consistent level, which reflects our attitude.

What the hon. Member said about training is very important. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's decision last year to withdraw the requirement for a two-year social work degree has been misinterpreted, and misrepresented widely. It has been said, as it has again in this debate, that the decision represents deskilling. I reject that claim altogether.

We believe that we need very much more broad-based probation training in order to face the challenge of today's crime scene. No one would deny that social work is relevant to probation work, or that any new training scheme introduced should contain an important element of social work training, but other disciplines are equally important. Probation should be seen as a discipline in its own right, and any training scheme must incorporate all the relevant skills—whether in criminology, sociology or psychology—and expert knowledge that is required.

The hon. Member said that working with drug offenders is very important. This morning, I launched the south London drug strategy, which will involve a great deal of work by a number of professionals—including social workers and probation officers—in arrest/referral schemes. We must make sure that we can offer people who are passing through the criminal justice system—at the time of arrest, in court or during community sentences—the support they need to get off drugs. In doing so, we can reduce crime. That area formed a much smaller proportion of the work of the probation service five or 10 years ago.

We propose that the training and qualifications for probation officers in the future should contain all those elements, and should not be dominated by one particular discipline or by those with university qualifications. The training should be composed of the elements that the service believes are needed. The service should design the course, which should contain enough flexibility to ensure that all the necessary elements are included. I hope that the negotiations will go ahead, and there is a meeting today between the Home Office and the profession. With good will on all sides, I am certain that the Home Office, the employers and managers of the probation service and higher education can come up with a course that reflects the needs and challenges of today.

Sir Irvine Patnick: May I join the Minister in praising the work of the South Yorkshire probation service? He may be aware that I made representations on behalf of that service to the previous Minister, and that those representations were considered before the changes that took place in the probation service. I am grateful for that, and I wonder whether my hon. Friend would like to comment.

Mr. Sackville: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. We need a relevant professional training qualification. The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone pointed out that the present system has attracted many mature people to the service, but we should not get carried away with the idea that we are trying to attract large numbers of ex-service men, who may or may not have relevant experience.

There is a strong argument that telling someone who wishes to join the service and who has relevant experience—someone who has worked with young people or has done a variety of work in the field—to undertake a two-year social work course could be a considerable disincentive. That is not the case for everyone—many people who are highly qualified and suitable for the service may be happy to get the degree.

Mr. Clapham: The probation service has experienced no difficulty whatsoever in attracting the kind of recruits it requires. We are not talking about apprentices, or about people who work with mechanical parts. We are not talking about people who work with widgets. We are talking about training for men and women who are to work with people. They will need a theoretical education to underpin the skills they will require to work with drug abusers and sex offenders.

Mr. Sackville: The hon. Member ignores this fact—there is no reason why all the theoretical knowledge could not be gained within a more flexible framework. It will be up to the probation service, in conjunction with all other concerned groups, to design relevant courses that contain all these elements. All that we are saying is that a two-year social work degree should not be compulsory.

I am convinced that certain qualified and suitable people will be put off if they are told that they have to take a two-year social work degree. Many people may need social work training, but not necessarily the full social work degree. I think that that was the burden of the earlier remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Sir I. Patnick).

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone also mentioned performance-related pay. Again, this matter has been widely misconstrued—including in the article to which he referred. The background is that a Home Office options paper was put to the employers' side of the joint negotiating committee. It made no specific proposal, and certainly did not specifically propose that performance should be linked specifically to reoffending. That would be difficult, and would be a caricature of any sensible performance system.

Some unnecessary fears have been expressed about the subject. It will always be up to the employers and local committees to decide on the nature of any performance-related scheme. All services should already be using the standard competence-based appraisal scheme that was introduced two years ago with the backing of all concerned. If properly used, such a scheme should provide an objective way of assessing and comparing performance, and it was designed to bear the weight of performance-related pay if necessary.

There are many ways of assessing performance—timeliness in producing pre-sentence reports; timeliness in producing welfare reports in family court cases; quality of pre-sentence reports; and compliance with national standards. There is no reason to caricature the proposal as in some way linked to a raw measure of reconviction. The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone's rather absurd analogies with judges and other parts of the criminal justice system did not add to the argument.

I accept the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone. Probation and the probation service do work, but they work alongside other aspects of the criminal justice system. Probation is not a substitute for prison. Given that the reconviction rate is about 50 per cent., we must assume that the reoffending rate—whether for those leaving prison or those who have gone through community sentences—is considerably higher.

That is an argument for the fairly robust line taken recently by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, who has recognised that—in cases of burglary, for example—very short sentences are passed from time to time on people who have offended and been convicted many times. There is room within the criminal justice system for an effective probation service, and we must make sure that the public are protected by taking those who persistently offend out of circulation.

We very much value the work of the probation service, and we hope that the present disagreement about the future of the probation training qualification—it has been going on for some months—will be resolved. There is no reason why we cannot find a flexible scheme that satisfies all sides and ensures that the probation service continues to play a vital part in our criminal justice system.

London Electronics College

1.29 pm

Sir Nicholas Scott (Chelsea): At a time when images of Culloden pour from our screens and appear in our newspapers and other journals week by week, it may be that it is another lost cause that I espouse in this brief debate this morning, in which I look forward to the response of my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for Education and Employment.

The London Electronics college in my constituency was founded in 1892 as the British School of Telegraphy. Although it did not invent the morse code, it was the crucible within which morse code was developed and expanded across the world. Morse code became a method of communication which saved many lives in the course of the century which divides us from the beginnings of the British School of Telegraphy. Morse code has now been largely supplanted by other means of communication on land, sea and air, but it still exists in a reduced state in different parts of the globe. The London Electronics college has in the 104 years which separate us from its founding played its part in those events, but more recently has devoted its attention to the development of courses in electronic engineering. It has been a leader in the provision of such courses to a considerable number of students, both students from overseas who come to learn and develop their skills here and our own young and not so young people who wish to acquire skills in electronics which they can bring to bear in their own commercial and industrial futures.

In the past few weeks we have discovered that no new contract is to be given to the London Electronics college for its development of electronic engineering skills. The college faces in the next 12 months a progressive winding down of operations in Penywern road and, unless fresh thought is given to the issue, closure. My case for the college rests not on some sentimental adherence to the past but on the important and crucial role that I believe that it may be able to play in the future.

Last year it was my privilege to visit the college and see the exciting work that was being conducted there and the commitment not only of the students aiming to develop their skills but of the staff and management, who have devoted themselves to improving and developing steadily the teaching and output of the college.

We all know how immensely important the future of engineering and perhaps particularly electronic engineering is to the commercial future of the country. My hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology was recently keen to stress the importance of encouraging high calibre young people to take up careers in engineering, including electronic engineering, and he has been instrumental in introducing into our schools schemes, such as the engineering education scheme and headstart, to encourage young people within the mainstream education system to take an interest in and develop an enthusiasm for engineering. That is an admirable, indeed essential, part of our commercial and industrial future.

We now know not only that the London Electronics college faces closure in the not-too-distant future but that, as the principal of the college wrote to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister about four weeks ago in response to a speech by him on the engineering profession:

> "All technician training in London has effectively been closed down by Centec"— the training and enterprise council responsible for training in central London—

> "and there is now no GNVQ advanced engineering or NVQ electronics servicing training by any of the eight London TECs provided within the national adult retraining programme commonly known as TFW."

Coincidentally but distressingly, that decision was announced during national science, engineering and technology week. One hopes that the Government might rather better co-ordinate some of their decisions in this important field.

The London Electronics college is a major part of the system in London for the development of electronic engineering skills. The clouds are gathering over its future. None of the fault can be laid at the door of the management or staff. There is no lack of applicants to take up places on the courses in the college. Complicated administrative reasons play some part. They involve first the Government, who operate mainly through the Government Office for London, then Centec—the organisation responsible for training across a range of skills in inner London—and the London Electronics college at the end of the process.

The chief executive of Centec is Mrs. Gwyneth Flower, a lady for whom I have considerable admiration. I have watched the enthusiasm that she has brought to her task. In a letter to the London Electronics college in the middle of last year she set out the reasons why clouds were beginning to gather, even then. She said:

> "Firstly, the category of trainees for which we are responsible are defined by the Government and are as follows: those six to 12 months unemployed, those 12 to 24 months unemployed, those with more than 24 months unemployment and those with special training needs. Between Government and ourselves we have to attempt to forecast the number of trainees in each category over the year in order to establish our average contract value. Each of the above categories is paid for at a different rate and you will see that this leads to a fairly complicated situation which has a major influence on our contractual flexibility"— that is to say their ability to provide what people who are out of work need in order to acquire the skills necessary to return to productive work.

Mrs. Flower went on to say:

> "I wish to make the point that it is Government policy to emphasise the delivery of jobs from TEC training programmes and, as a consequence, the value of a higher education qualification has been reduced from four to two points"— that is to say in assessing the performance of the providers. She continues:

> "This is not of our making; it is part of a Government requirement placed upon us. While we may protest about this, the requirement remains."

If we are looking ahead to our future in the business of electronic engineering, the continued provision of high-quality skills will lie at the core of what we all, if we look at it in a rational way, should endeavour to produce. In essence, we are taking too short-term a view of the development of skills in what I reiterate will be an important part of our future commercial success.

We have reached the point where no training and enterprise council offers advanced engineering training for adult retraining in the London region. Last month, Centec cut all training provision by one third with only two weeks' notice. TECs are influenced—"encouraged" may be too strong a word—to place payment emphasis and recruitment on job outcomes, not on national vocational qualifications or on higher education. I believe that that is a short-term way of looking at this area of activity.

I understand that some TECs are now paying commercial recruitment agencies to obtain jobs for them, which would have been obtained by applicants anyway. Agencies are then double funded—by employers and by TECs. I am also told—the Minister can confirm whether this is true—that some recruitment agencies have been making special deals with his Department to get this funding.

TEC funding is not going to the long-term, high-quality training that ought to be our first priority in this important area. As I understand it—I have no reason to doubt the information that I have been given—in order to achieve the training outcomes set by the Government, emphasis is increasingly being given to things such as low-level keyboard skills or to what is called, in the jargon of the trade, training hamburger flippers—that may be an overstatement. There is a reducing emphasis on high-quality skills and an increasing emphasis on low-level skills that can produce the right figures but do not underpin our industrial success for the future.

Our jobless youngsters deserve better than this. Young people who have been unemployed for more than six months undertake low-level training schemes that have a low skill requirement and they receive short-term training. They then go back on the register. That may do something to reduce the number of people on the unemployment register at any particular time and it may help to keep those figures down, but our young people deserve better than that. They ought to have the opportunity to acquire higher skills that not only provide them and their families with proper levels of remuneration but underpin our success in these areas for our industrial future. I am sure that our future prosperity depends on a better answer than the one we have at the moment in the training area. The London Electronics college provides that. It would be a tragedy if it were to close.

1.42 pm

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): I endorse the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott). I know of the high reputation of the London Electronics college and I was appalled to hear that no new contract will be forthcoming, as was mentioned by my right hon. Friend. First, I was the Secretary of State for Employment who introduced training and enterprise councils. The idea was to get away from the kind of bureaucracy that had harmed training in this country for quite a number of years. We had a so-called national training system that was far too bureaucratic, that was not owned and that was entirely ineffective.

The aims of the training enterprise councils were that they should be owned locally, that they should be flexible, that their training should be relevant to the people living in the area, that the public sector should be involved and that we should train people with skills and for skills. I am bound to say that I have been concerned about the complaint after complaint—my right hon. Friend graphically illustrated this in the letter that he read out—that I have heard about what I would call a creeping bureaucracy coming back into the training and enterprise council system. If that is so, it is certainly not what was intended. I hope that the Government will look at the points made by my right hon. Friend in this respect.

Secondly, the aim of the training and enterprise councils—indeed, the aim of any sensible training system—is to train people in skills. It is important that there should be a job for people at the end of the day, but one cannot have a training system entirely plugged into the employment market in every respect. It may be that in some areas training—for example, training at the London Electronics college—will lead to higher education and further training. One should not turn one's back on that.

I am concerned with the issue that my right hon. Friend has raised. There are signs that the new training and enterprise council system that the Government introduced to get away from the national bureaucracy of the old Manpower Services Commission and all that that entailed is being slightly misused. I hope that the Government will be able to give some indication that the future of the London Electronics college will be looked at again and that a better solution will be found.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. James Paice): I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea (Sir N. Scott) for initiating the debate. He has shown considerable diligence in this matter over some months. He raised the issue in a letter to the Secretary of State. Obviously, he is concerned about the future of the London Electronics college, which is in his constituency. I preface my remarks by making it clear that it is primarily a matter for the parties concerned. I shall address the points raised by my right hon. Friends the Member for Chelsea and for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler). The detail of the contract is a matter for the parties concerned.

The college has been a Central London training and enterprise council provider for the last four years. The use of the name "college" does not mean that it is necessarily part of the further education sector or that it is a formal college under the local education authority. It is a wholly private organisation—Government Members would not expect me to suggest that that is a criticism; I am putting the matter into context.

The college has been a Centec provider for the last four years and it has been providing courses in a number of areas related to electronics, engineering and applications systems. It has offered national vocational qualifications at levels 2, 3 and 4. The college has been successful in meeting the targets set in its contracts for the number of trainees achieving NVQs—in fact, 38 per cent. of the trainees obtain an NVQ.

However, the college has been unsuccessful in meeting the targets for the number of trainees who leave training and then enter employment. That is now the key performance indicator under training for work, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea referred. My figures show that only 4 per cent. of its trainees obtain jobs at the end of their courses, compared with the national target—and achievement—of close to 45 per cent. That is a clear difference in achievement—it is not a matter of a few points.

My right hon. Friend also referred to the issue of training and its relationship to jobs. Of course, training must not be wholly related to the jobs that exist at the time. However, it is equally true that training cannot take place in a vacuum away from the labour market. Obviously, I pay immense tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield for introducing TECs with a considerable amount of vision.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield will recall my humble membership of the Employment Select Committee at that time and the considerable enthusiasm that its Conservative members had for his proposal. The development of TECs is a great change in the delivery of training. One of their principal duties is to examine the local labour market and ensure that the training that is provided relates to its needs. Clearly, it is important that the training for which TECs contract relates to local needs, where real jobs exist.

My right hon. Friends know that TECs are, rightly, independent companies led by local business people for the reasons that my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield described when he set them up. They work under performance-related contracts with Government and their mission is to provide the country with the skilled and enterprising work force that it needs. There can be few hon. Members who would dissent from that mission.

Each TEC agrees a corporate plan with the Secretary of State in line with cross-Government strategic guidance and an economic assessment of the needs of its area. Those corporate plans are publicly available and form part of longer-term, three-year licensing arrangements. We are coming to the end of the first phase of the licensing programme because the majority of TECs now have three-year licences. Each has a duty to secure value for money and to maximise performance. They have a duty in respect of, and are accountable to this House through me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for, their guardianship of public funds.

Ultimately, it is not the future of individual training providers that matters—over time quite a number have closed their doors for various reasons—but future adequate provision for the labour market and for all potential students who wish to undertake some form of training. I entirely share the enthusiasm of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield for the concept of TECs and his concern about the rumours of what he called "creeping bureaucracy". There is no doubt that some training providers are concerned about that. My right hon. Friend may know that an efficiency scrutiny of the Government's relationship with TECs has recently been undertaken. A 40-point plan came out of that and we have rejected only two of those points. Almost all of them were implemented at the beginning of April. One or two of the bigger points will take until next April to implement.

There is also some concern—I have raised this with TECs and we are taking it forward—that some bureaucracy has been generated, not by Government but by individual TECs. We must tackle that. Putting my tongue in my cheek, I could say that the price of setting them up as independent companies, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield rightly did, is that I have that much less control over what they do. However, I am anxious to address the problem of bureaucracy.

The performance of every TEC is kept constantly under review and we publish each autumn tables comparing achievements that relate especially to the annual contract with my Department. As part of those negotiations, we expect that in the current year 197,000 training opportunities will be provided under training for work, which will lead to 45 per cent. of those trainees obtaining jobs. I emphasise the difference between that 45 per cent. and the actual achievement of the London Electronics college.

My right hon. Friends will no doubt be aware of this morning's excellent news that unemployment has fallen yet again to 7.8 per cent. of the population. That is an important factor because it underlines the Government's belief that the principal responsibility for training, especially to higher level skills, to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea rightly referred, must lie with employers. The Government cannot be expected to provide all the training that may be required by employers.

We believe that training for work should be focused on getting unemployed people back into the work force and doing something useful. Although my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea referred to hamburger flippers and low-level skills, that is not the objective of training for work—although there are some service jobs that may fit that description. We want people to get back into work and, once there, for employers to shoulder the burden of improving and developing their skills. We have ample evidence that that is happening. The surveys that came out this morning with the unemployment figures show that employers are expecting, yet again, to increase their investment in training.

I shall now deal with the specifics of the London Electronics college. I understand that Centec, the TEC that covers the area, reviews the performance of all its training providers as part of a continual examination and review of its training strategy. We all appreciate that it is important for it to review its contractual partners and, where necessary, to make changes. As a result of that, Centec decided not to contract with the college this year.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea made two suggestions that he believed to be correct. I think that they are both wrong but I will check them. He first suggested that Centec cut its training for work programme by a third at two weeks' notice. Colloquially, I may say that it is news to me if it did; there would be no justification for that. The Government have not cut training for work by a third and certainly not at two weeks' notice. Our plans for training for work for the coming year were published in the public expenditure survey at the end of November last year. I do not believe that Centec would have had any justification for doing that. I would therefore be very surprised if it had done it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea also referred to the suggestion that recruitment agencies operate to get people into work and that there may be special deals with my Department. Certainly, there are no special deals with my Department. As far as operations with TECs are concerned, I cannot say that categorically but, again, I would be surprised if that is happening. I would be very disappointed and would wish to investigate the matter further. As far as the Department is concerned, it is not happening.

I know that Centec has been in discussion with the college and that they have discussed how the college might attract alternative funding. I was concerned when I read the information about the college to find that more than 90 per cent. of its funding is from contracts with TECs, principally with Centec. That is a very high proportion of its eggs in one basket.

Alternatives may be possible. For instance, the college may wish to consider the possibility of funding from the Further Education Funding Council as an external institution. The council may provide funds to institutions and bodies outside the further education sector for provision that falls within schedule 2 of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 and where the council can be persuaded that existing provision is inadequate. Currently, applications for council funding by external institutions must be sponsored by an institution in the FE sector. The Government have already made it clear in the last competitiveness White Paper that we intend to remove that requirement, but it exists at present.

Ultimately, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea said, we must be concerned about where people will get training in future. In the past 24 hours I have carefully examined what is available in central London. Several FE colleges serve the area—Southwark, Lambeth, City of Westminster and Hammersmith and Fulham. They provide a range of full and part-time electronics and electrical engineering courses. It will be for the FEFC to decide whether there is a need for further provision. If it did so decide, it could fund it.

I shall not bore the House by going through the substantial list of courses that are currently provided in the area that my right hon. Friend represents. Alternatives are already available. That undermines the statements made by the head of the college in the letter to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, to which I know he will respond shortly. There is clearly alternative provision. Despite that, the college may wish to consider approaching FE sector colleges in its area with a view to seeking sponsorship for funding in the year to come.

I know that my remarks will not have brought all the help that my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea wished for. I am sorry that I am unable to be as helpful as that, but I hope that I have explained some of the background and, most importantly, that there is alternative provision. There is scope for the college to consider other ways forward and I hope that it will do that.

I hope that I have convinced both my right hon. Friends that there is a considerable amount of good work happening in the TEC movement, for which we all wish to pay tribute to its progenitor. I thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea for raising the subject.

It being Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Sitting suspended, pursuant to Standing Order No. 10 (Wednesday sittings), till half-past Two o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Small Businesses

1. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assistance is given by his Department to help small businesses; and if he will make a statement. [23915]

6. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals his Department has to assist small and medium-sized businesses; and if he will make a statement. [23921]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): The Government recognise the crucial role played by small firms and aim to assist them by keeping inflation and interest rates low and by reducing legislative, administrative and taxation burdens. A range of measures and schemes has been introduced to help small firms, in particular, the network of business link one-stop shops of which there are now more than 200 in operation.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Secretary of State aware that in the recent referendum of small business people, 75 per cent. asked for competition in the installation of water meters and public utility services? Is he also aware of the anger and frustration that late payments have generated in the world of small business? Will he stress to his Cabinet colleagues the need for early legislation to help small business people in their campaign for fairness over late payments?

Mr. Lang: We are still on question No. 1, Madam Speaker, and question No. 2 deals with late payments, but since the hon. Gentleman started with a reference to referendums, I must point out that the majority of small business organisations are against statutory arrangements to deal with the late payment of debts. I warmly welcome the conversion of some Labour supporters to the importance of competition in the provision of goods and services. Competition has led to improved efficiency in electricity and the substantial reductions in gas prices in recent years.

Mr. Llwyd: Is the Minister aware that the latest European Business Monitor survey shows that two thirds of businesses monitored are of the opinion that economic growth will come from small and medium-sized enterprises? Given their important role in the economics of the United Kingdom, when will he offer some practical help? It is all very well talking about interest rates, and so on, but more important things should be done. What about the crippling effect of business rates on smaller businesses? What about the burden of value added tax? What about assisting small businesses to expand and take on new trainees and so forth? When are the Government going to do something and not just talk?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman does not know what is going on in the world. The Government long ago recognised the importance of small businesses in generating employment and economic activity. Unlike the Labour party, we have identified and implemented specific measures to help. The hon. Gentleman mentioned VAT. He may not realise that the VAT threshold was increased again in the last Budget; it is the highest in the European Union and has exempted 75,000 companies from VAT. He may not be aware of the changes made in auditing requirements, capital gains tax and inheritance tax, and the reduction in small firms' corporation tax. The Government have identified the problems of small business and found measures to help.

Sir John Cope: My right hon. Friend did a good job in organising the "Your Business Matters" conferences throughout the country, which concluded last month. Several important proposals came out of those. Can he tell us any more, particularly about the proposals to streamline local authority registration and controls on fire, planning and so forth into a one-stop shop affair and about single registration of new companies for income tax, VAT and other things?

Mr. Lang: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That was an extremely successful series of conferences at which the Government consulted very closely with small businesses all round the country. A number of measures were announced by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at the final conference in London, including the streamlining of development controls, new rights in enforcement actions, and single notification for tax and national insurance arrangements for new businesses. In addition to those welcome measures announced at the conference, we made it clear that further announcements and a response to the input from all the conferences will be published with the competitiveness White Paper in June.

Mr. Dover: Is not the acid test how many small businesses are formed? Did not the number of small businesses grow from 2.5 million to 3.5 million between 1979 and 1993, showing the confidence that firms have in setting up under this Government? And did not the number of company insolvencies fall by 13 per cent. last year compared with the previous year?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right on both points. Between 1979 and 1993 the number of businesses in this country rose by 50 per cent.—an increase of 1.2 million—and it is clear that under this Government opportunity for enterprise, the building up of economic activity and the creation of small businesses has been greater than ever before.

Mrs. Roche: How can the President of the Board of Trade be so complacent about small firms and late payments in view of the Government's record? Whenever a survey on the statutory right to interest is conducted in the small business community—such as that conducted by Lloyd's Bank—such a right is overwhelmingly supported and 65 Conservative Members have signed an early-day motion supporting Labour party policy. How can the Minister be so complacent about the Government's record on small businesses when he now proposes to exclude more than 100,000 small catering firms from the loan guarantee scheme? Does not that proposal expose the gap between Government rhetoric and reality?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Lady is quite wrong. The loan guarantee scheme has been redesigned and extended in some important ways, but we are also avoiding displacement of existing economic activity by that scheme. On late payment of debts, the hon. Lady may like to know that eight out of nine business organisations are opposed to the introduction of statutory interest payments on late payment of debts. Government policy such as the requirement to disclose payment policy has been warmly welcomed and we are now consulting on disclosing payment practice. We are encouraging and are signing on for the Confederation of Business and Industry code of payment conduct. It is important to change the culture in relation to late payment of debt, because no amount of legislation will succeed unless the culture changes. That is what is happening under the Government.

Mr. Congdon: Is not the best assistance to small businesses the continuation of economic policies that have led to the creation of a stable macroeconomic framework, which has today led to a further reduction in unemployment of nearly 26,000 people? Is that not the right way to achieve benefits for small businesses, rather than imposing burdens on them such as the social chapter and the minimum wage?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Like him, I warmly welcome the further fall in unemployment this month of 25,700 people. Unemployment has now been falling at an average of 10,000 people per month and is now very substantially over 3 percentage points below the European average. My hon. Friend is also right to identify what would be the cause of job losses in very large numbers: the social chapter and the national minimum wage, which are policies supported by the Labour party.

2. Ms Lynne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the recent meetings he has held with representatives of small businesses about late payment of commercial debt. [23917]

The Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): The Prime Minister, the President of the Board of Trade and I were all present at the national "Your Business Matters" conference on 11 March, which was attended by representatives of all the major small firms organisations. A number of important issues were raised, including the late payment of commercial debt. In addition, I have recently consulted all the small firms' representative organisations on late payments and legislation for a statutory right to interest. The outcome will be published soon.

Ms Lynne: Is the Minister aware that some small businesses in Rochdale are facing increasing financial difficulty because of late payment of debt by many companies and by Government Departments? We know that he is currently consulting small businesses. If that consultation reveals that small businesses are in favour of interest being paid on late payment of debt, will the Government introduce legislation to make it possible?

Mr. Page: I have to put it delicately to the hon. Lady that she is labouring under a misconception. The problems being experienced by small firms are not caused by their not being paid by large firms. Research has shown that in fact the problem is that small firms are hitting other small firms. Research by Professor Wilson of Bradford university, which is to be published shortly, will confirm previous investigations. He found that the problem is caused by small firms themselves. He also concluded that some 40 per cent. of small firms do not undertake proper up-front credit control and that the companies which do have proper front-ending credit control have a 35 per cent. better chance of being paid promptly than those which do not. Small firms therefore have a management responsibility, too.

In specific response to the hon. Lady's question, consultation is under way. I shall be announcing the results shortly and any decisions will flow from those results.

Sir Michael Grylls: Does my hon. Friend agree that most small firms want less rather than more legislation and that they do not want legislation on the payment of debts? Does he agree that it would be much better to make public companies state in their accounts what their payment policy is and how promptly they pay their bills? Should we not get the Government and local government to pay small firms promptly? If that could be arranged, would not the problem largely be solved?

Mr. Page: As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade said, eight out of nine of the small firms' representative organisations have stated that they are against the introduction of a statutory right to interest on commercial late payment. I shall have to take that into account in evaluating the consultation.

As for payment practice and payment policy, it has already been agreed that public companies will have to put payment principle in their annual accounts. The Prime Minister has asked that consultation take place on payment practice, and I believe that is to happen in the next month or so.

Mr. Gunnell: A number of small firms in my area contributed to the consultation on the Latham report and wonder why nothing has happened as a result. Is the Minister promising legislation? Companies in my area think that the Government have been dilatory in this respect. They wanted something to happen urgently. They submitted evidence and the report was published, but nothing happened.

Mr. Page: I can give the hon. Gentleman some very good news. The Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Bill currently going through the House of Lords will for the first time introduce a proper payment practice for firms in the construction industry. It will prevent the pay-when-paid scandal and help small businesses immensely. It is a positive move in the right direction.

Mr. John Marshall: My hon. Friend referred to a recent meeting that he had with small business men. How many of them asked him to sign up to the social chapter and a national minimum wage or recommended that people earning £35,000 a year should pay more income tax?

Mr. Page: I have to chide my hon. Friend for being political, which is not a path that I wish to pursue. All I can say is that if we adopted a national minimum wage, unemployment would rise by nearly a million and small business men would be the hardest hit if the Labour party were successful and a national minimum wage were introduced.

Land Mines

3. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to ban the (a) manufacture and (b) export of land mines in (i) part and (ii) complete form. [23918]

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Anthony Nelson): We already have in place a wide-ranging national moratorium on the export of anti-personnel land mines. I have no plans to ban the manufacture of such land mines, although they have not been manufactured in this country or exported for a number of years.

Mr. Smith: Will the Minister follow the lead of General Schwarzkopf, 14 other high-ranking United States generals and the Australian Government in banning the use of anti-personnel land mines? Will the Government press for such a ban at the convention on inhumane weapons in Geneva next week?

Mr. Nelson: We keep those matters under constant review and we take careful notice of what our allies—particularly those in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation—do in that regard. As the hon. Gentleman acknowledges, the proper place to discuss such matters is at the United Nations weaponry convention, which holds its concluding session towards the end of the month and I hope that it may lead to the implementation of a tighter regime. For the time being, however, the British Army and the British Government believe that land mines are necessary for our use and that casualties would be incurred if we did not have them. We do not export or manufacture them and we have imposed a moratorium and a ban on their export in a wide range of categories to a large number of countries.

Sir Donald Thompson: Will my hon. Friend take the matter very seriously, as hon. Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the proliferation of land mines which are disturbing even the aid going to Bosnia, including the recent very successful trip to that country organised by Welsh Rotary and supported by the international company Hasbro? Will my hon. Friend combine with officers in the Ministry of Defence and in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to ensure that our voice is the loudest to speak out on the international scene against land mines?

Mr. Nelson: I of course take very seriously the points that my hon. Friend raises. We play an active role in international discussions about this issue and we abhor any loss of civilian life involved with the use of so-called dumb land mines. However, we must recognise that many land mines are used in internal conflicts in developing countries. When introducing any regimes or bans, it is important to ensure that the world acts in concert rather than unilaterally.

Many Opposition Members—67 of whom have signed an early-day motion on the subject—continually hark back to unilateralism. That would be absolutely pointless in this and in other areas. International agreement is important and Her Majesty's Government are intent upon achieving it.

Engineering

4. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on engineering (a) investment, (b) exports and (c) profitability. [23919]

Mr. Lang: Information on the profitability of the engineering industry is not collected centrally, but engineering industry exports were £75 billion in 1995—an increase of 18 per cent over 1994. As for investment, the business trends survey of the Engineering Employers Federation shows that it continues to be buoyant.

Mr. Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend, who was at school with me, accept the views expressed by the Manufacturing and Construction Industries Alliance—and shared by the Engineering Employers Federation—that quality of training is vital to the manufacturing industry and contributes directly to investment, exports and profitability? Does he agree that a skilled and a motivated work force is one of the United Kingdom's greatest assets? Will he and his Department help to drive forward the recommendations in Sir Ronald Dearing's review of qualifications for 16 to 19-year-olds in order to ensure that quality of training is a priority?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend and I were indeed at school together, although he looks far too young, and I agree absolutely that training is important. I warmly welcome Sir Ronald Dearing's proposals, which are not very different from those that I introduced in Scotland some years ago. I recognise the importance of improved training, and the improvements in the engineering industry are reflected by the fact that productivity in that industry rose by 21 per cent. between 1990 and 1995.

Mr. Sheldon: Is it not clear that the Government have shamefully neglected the importance of the manufacturing industry? Thankfully, that has now changed, but the Government still do not appreciate the importance of manufacturing investment. Capital allowances are only 25 per cent., which is less than depreciation in the first year. That is equivalent to a tax on investment in the first year. Should not the President of the Board of Trade be doing something about that?

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Gentleman seems to be a little out of touch with the manufacturing industry investment figures, which for plant and machinery rose by almost 10 per cent. last year and by some 15 per cent. in the past two years. He may be interested to know that unemployment in the manufacturing sector fell by 3,000 last month. Clearly, the success of the United Kingdom manufacturing industry is a reflection of the Government's successful management of the economy.

Mr. Dunn: Given the increase in manufacturing exports of some 90 per cent. since 1979, does my right hon. Friend agree that the introduction of the minimum wage and the social chapter would create an absolute nightmare for British success overseas?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Looking at the social chapter alone, non-wage labour costs in the United Kingdom are some 18 per cent. while in Germany they are 32 per cent. and in Italy and France they are more than 40 per cent. It is because we have become more competitive and avoided such additional costs that United Kingdom manufacturing industry is now so successful.

Mr. Kaufman: Will the right hon. Gentleman condemn the decision by GEC to close its electrical engineering subsidiary, Long and Crawford at Gorton road, Manchester, with the destruction of 135 jobs, many of them held by men with a lifetime of skilled and dedicated service? The company is offering meagre redundancy payments and 100 workers who are being transferred to another site are having their pay reduced by £60 per week. Exports to the middle east, the Gulf and south America are being thrown away and the site is being asset stripped at a profit to GEC. Is that not a disgraceful way to approach manufacturing industry?

Mr. Lang: I regret the loss of any job in any factory in any constituency, but I simply do not recognise the picture that the right hon. Gentleman paints of GEC, which is one of our most efficient, competitive, aggressive and successful companies in export and domestic markets all over the world. GEC has made a substantial contribution to the rise in British manufacturing exports of 90 per cent. since 1979 because the Government have allowed it to manage its own affairs in the way it thinks best.

Mr. Fabricant: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, unlike the motley crew opposite, who are made up of ex-journalists, ex-trade union officials and ex-failed polytechnic lecturers, I worked in the engineering industry? Does he realise that the social chapter would not only produce the additional on-costs to which he has already referred, but that if we were to sign up to that terrible document, we would be signing a blank cheque with heaven knows what result for British industry, particularly engineering?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. As British industry, particularly our engineering industry, has become so efficient, it has been able to achieve the figures that I have given the House. That is why the prospect of growth for next year also looks most promising.

Mr. Ingram: Will the President of the Board of Trade confirm the shocking figures that his ministerial colleague gave the House on 20 March when he said:

"In the United Kingdom . . . only 12 per cent. of science and engineering graduates are in engineering. In Germany, the figure is 18 per cent.; in France it is 21 per cent. Germany produces a third more engineering and technology PhDs per head of population than we do and five times as many people are qualified to MSc standard."—[Official Report, 20 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 326.]

Who is to blame for that shocking state of affairs? Is it our competitors, because they are so much better than us, or is it the Government, who systematically destroyed our manufacturing and engineering base during the 1980s?

Mr. Lang: There has been a substantial increase in the number of engineering graduates in recent years. Next year, the Government will be sponsoring the Year of Engineering Success, which I am sure will be as successful as the recent Science, Engineering and Technology Week. The successful management of the economy and the encouragement of better skills has meant that engineering has contributed to British exports, which since 1981 have grown faster than those of Germany, France or Japan.

Mis-selling of Gas Contracts

5. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with the Director General of Gas Supply about mis–selling of gas contracts in the south-west. [23920]

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): My Department is keeping closely in touch with the Office of Gas Supply about the progress of gas competition in the south-west.

Mr. Jamieson: Is the Minister aware that trading standards officers in Devon have received record numbers of complaints about the selling by Swebgas of contracts to customers who were tricked into signing those contracts? Is he aware that Ofgas is totally helpless to protect customers? Is this yet another example of the Government looking after the market and putting the interests of consumers second?

Mr. Eggar: I have never heard anything more nonsensical, even from the Opposition. This Government introduced competition in the south-west and made it possible for consumers to be offered reductions of up to 25 per cent. in their gas bills.

Mr. Hicks: While in no way condoning unnecessarily aggressive salesmen, does not the introduction of other companies supplying gas in Devon and Cornwall afford the opportunity for gas price reductions in real terms, particularly in a region which hitherto has suffered as a consequence of regional differential pricing?

Mr. Eggar: I absolutely agree. Consumers in the south-west trial area can choose their gas supplier from 10 different competitors, a number of which are offering supplies without a standing charge or with substantial discounts to low-use as well as high-use consumers. That good news for consumers has been widely welcomed throughout the south-west.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Given the record number of complaints from customers in the south-west about mis-selling, how can consumers trust the same company to take over half the country's electricity generation?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman always accentuates the negative. He is meant to represent the interests of consumers for his party, but we have not heard a single word of welcome from the hon. Gentleman for the substantial reductions in gas prices for individual consumers. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that individual consumers in the south-west can get reductions in their gas bills of up to 25 per cent. Why does the hon. Gentleman not welcome that fact, even though he has always opposed competition up to now?

Mr. Harris: Will my right hon. Friend reject the predictable carping of Labour Members and accept the genuine thanks of consumers across the south-west, who welcome increased competition which in some cases will mean £70 off the average gas bill? Is that not a good example of Conservative policies in action to the benefit of consumers?

Mr. Eggar: I completely agree. Those Conservative policies were introduced in the face of opposition by Labour Front-Benchers, whose arguments have been disproved by the results of competition so far in the south-west. I have no doubt that in the coming months large numbers of my hon. Friend's constituents will benefit considerably from reductions. He mentioned £70 off the average gas bill, but in my view that figure may be extended—and there are likely to be increased standards of service to individual consumers in addition to price reductions.

Renewable Energy

7. Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to help promote renewable energy sources and industries in the United Kingdom. [23922]

Mr. Page: The Government are stimulating the development of new and renewable energy technologies and industrial and market infrastructure via the non-fossil fuel obligation and a supporting programme.

Mr. Tipping: Will the Minister consider further steps to help this country's environmental technology industries—including, for example, solar power, for which the global market was worth £1 billion in 1993. At that time, Britain had 10 per cent. of solar panel exports but was spending less than 1p per person on solar research. Should not a research framework be established so that the UK can be the enterprise centre for creating new energy sources, making sure that British companies get a fair share of the world market?

Mr. Page: I am well aware of the hon. Gentleman's particular interest, and I broadly agree with the thrust of his question. He is right to remind the House that we sometimes take access to electricity for granted. We should never forget that millions of people have no electricity and that the only means of obtaining it will be through the use of photovoltaics. I can give the hon. Gentleman some good news. BP Solar alone achieved 7 per cent. of the world market in 1995 and has so far attracted orders in excess of £15 million. The market is huge, as the hon. Gentleman told the House, and I certainly want to see it developed.

Mr. Ian Bruce: My hon. Friend will know that the Government have been encouraging local authorities to burn municipal waste to create energy, but will he carefully consider the representations on the subject? Most constituents are in theory happy with that approach, but they do not want the effluent from incinerators anywhere near their homes. I wonder whether the Government have got local popular opinion wrong.

Mr. Page: The decision on where to locate any particular NFFO project is a planning matter for the local authority. The NFFO project is a two-pronged objective. One objective is environmental improvement, to reduce the pollution that comes from conventional methods of energy production, and the other is the creation of a manufacturing base in renewables.

Mr. Battle: As the Minister said that he agrees with my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping) and that he is especially keen on photovoltaics, why does he not open up the fossil fuel levy, which at present excludes support for photovoltaics? Would it not be better to let them in to ensure that we end up a world leader in that industry and do not fall further behind?

Mr. Page: I remind the hon. Gentleman that the whole purpose of the non-fossil fuel obligation is to bring about a convergence of energy production from renewables so that that approach can actively and competitively compete in the market against conventional energy producers. The question of photovoltaics will be considered alongside all the others when we consider NFFO5 and, if it can achieve some market convergence, it could certainly be included. I would want to be convinced that the market convergence will be obtained, because I do not want to waste taxpayers' money.

Manufacturing (East Midlands)

8. Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next plans to visit Leicestershire for discussions with representatives of the manufacturing sector about Government policies to encourage exports and inward investment from and into the east midlands. [23923]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Phillip Oppenheim): Ministers in the Department keep in touch with all regions on a regular basis to stress the Government's commitment to competitiveness. The latest available figures show that the east midlands has the highest proportion of manufacturing gross domestic product of all the regions.

Mr. Garnier: Is my hon. Friend aware of just how successful the manufacturing sector of the east midlands and Leicestershire is in exporting not only to the European Union but to the wider world? Does he agree that one of the reasons for that is the highly useful role that the business links offices in Leicester and Market Harborough, which cover my constituency, have played? Does my hon. Friend also agree that the reason why we attract so much inward investment into those business regions is that we do not have a statutory minimum wage?

Mr. Oppenheim: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend, and it is not just the east midlands that has benefited. A recent survey showed that while the manufacturing productivity gap with Germany expanded to its widest margin by 1979, we in Britain have closed three quarters of that manufacturing productivity and competitiveness gap with Germany since 1979. That is quite an achievement and it shows that the period when Britain was in danger of becoming a second-rate, non-manufacturing, skivvy, low-wage economy was not under the Government but in the heroic days of Labour's industrial strategy.

Mr. Purchase: Is it not true that the majority of our productivity gains have been caused by loss of labour in key manufacturing areas? Is it not also true that, in the face of Tory complacency, manufacturing as a fraction of GDP fell by more than a third in the years of Tory control? How does the Minister explain that away?

Mr. Oppenheim: First, the manufacturing sector in relation to GDP in Britain is at about the same level as in other European countries, such as France and Italy. Secondly—[Interruption.] If hon. Gentlemen would listen, they would hear that the number of manufacturing jobs has fallen in virtually every industrialised country. It has risen slightly in this country recently. What matters is not just the jobs in manufacturing but manufacturing productivity, which has risen because of organisational and efficiency improvements and manufacturing output. The key point is that whereas manufacturing output fell under the last Labour Government, it has risen sharply under this Government.

Rural Depopulation

9. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further incentives he proposes to assist industrial development in those rural areas in the United Kingdom experiencing depopulation; and if he will make a statement. [23924]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John M. Taylor): The Government provide a number of measures to encourage industry and commerce in rural areas. Some rural areas, such as the hon. Gentleman's constituency, also qualify for European structural funds objective 5b programmes and from Community initiatives programmes such as Leader II, for which further funding will be announced shortly.

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the Minister confirm that unemployment levels are still the determining factor for eligibility for regional selective assistance? Does he accept that some rural communities—such as Hawick in my constituency, which is not unique because there are similar communities throughout the United Kingdom—find that people leave the area to find work rather than sign on and register as unemployed? Will the Minister therefore give urgent consideration to making rural areas potentially eligible for regional selective assistance, where they can show long-term population decline as a result of job losses?

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is right; unemployment has always been one of the dominant criteria. However, many factors are included in the RSA calculations. I pledge that I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion about depopulation is considered when the criteria are next reviewed.

Plant and Machinery

10. Mr. Pope: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the level of manufacturing investment in plant and machinery in (a) 1989 and (b) 1995. [23925]

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): Manufacturing investment in plant and machinery, measured in constant prices, was £12 billion in 1989 and £10.3 billion in 1995. Investment in plant and machinery has grown by 16 per cent over the past two years as the economy has recovered from the recession.

Mr. Pope: Manufacturing accounts for only 20 per cent. of gross domestic product. Almost 3 million jobs in manufacturing have been lost since 1979. Manufacturing output is stagnant. This appalling state of affairs is the result either of incompetence or of malice on behalf of the Government; which is it?

Mr. Taylor: The manufacturing base has been immensely strengthened since 1979 when compared with the appalling performance under the Labour Government. Manufacturing output has reached a peak. It is recovering very quickly. I am delighted that 3,000 extra jobs were created last month alone in the manufacturing sector. Manufacturing output has risen 6.25 per cent. above its previous peak. That is all good news on the 20th anniversary of the Royal Academy of Engineering, which I shall be celebrating with it this evening.

Mr. Batiste: Is it not clear as we look around the world, including at Japan, America, Taiwan and Germany, that companies that are the best manufacturers regard Britain as the best place in Europe in which to manufacture? Is that not a consequence of the range of Government measures introduced since 1979, which have been opposed root and branch by the Labour party, year in and year out? Those measures are even now threatened by the Labour party's commitment to the social chapter, which would tie us irrevocably to the social costs that are making German manufacturing uncompetitive.

Mr. Taylor: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Over the past 10 years the United Kingdom has received £100 million-worth of inward investment, which has created employment throughout the country. We are the only Group of Seven country in which non-manufacturing costs form a lower proportion of total labour costs than in 1980. Our manufacturing record and the way in which we have responded to world competitive challenge are remarkable. The Labour party should remember to give some praise to British manufacturers' efforts.

Mrs. Beckett: Will the Minister take the opportunity to dissociate the Department of Trade and Industry once again from one of the more dangerous recent statements of the Deputy Prime Minister, when he suggested that levels of investment in manufacturing offered no cause for concern, especially as his justification was that business investment in the United Kingdom was a higher percentage of gross domestic product than in most other countries within the Group of Seven? The Library tells me that it is unable to substantiate the statement.

Does the Minister accept that, as the confidence of the Deputy Prime Minister seems to be misplaced, so too is the Government's rejection of measures such as investment allowances, which would encourage increased investment in manufacturing?

Mr. Taylor: I shall not get into a debate over librarians' statistics with the right hon. Lady. I want to get it across to the House that manufacturing industry is making an enormous effort to compete in the world. The CBI figures show that manufacturing investment could be up by 9 per cent. this year. Even the Institute of Manufacturing's figure is up by 7 per cent. The right hon. Lady would be best served if she gave attention and encouragement to that process.

Future Large Aircraft

11. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what request his Department has received for launch aid from aircraft, aero-engine or aerospace equipment manufacturing companies in the United Kingdom towards participation in the Airbus Industrie future large aircraft project. [23926]

Mr. Eggar: No such request has been received. Launch aid is granted under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 and is not available for military projects.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am reassured by that answer, as the market to which the FLA could be directed is already dominated at the one end by the C130J, in which British industry has a large stake, and at the other by the C17 McDonnell Douglas transporter. Would not launch aid be much better applied to Airbus Industrie's construction of a new jumbo jet, preferably in collaboration with McDonnell Douglas, which also wants to build such an aircraft, so that we can take on Boeing and fill the last remaining gap in Airbus Industrie's inventory of aircraft at the top end of the range?

Mr. Eggar: I take note of my hon. Friend's views. With regard to the future of Airbus Industrie, it is the Government's view that the highest priority is the rationalisation and increased competitiveness of Airbus Industrie, thus enabling it to compete effectively with Boeing and other aircraft manufacturers.

Mr. Cousins: Will the Minister make it clear that there will be no question of support for Airbus Industrie's jumbo jet project if it continues to have exclusive agreements with General Electric of the United States to build aircraft engines, to the disadvantage and exclusion of British aircraft engine manufacturers?

Mr. Eggar: Certain of the Airbus Industrie aircraft already use Rolls-Royce engines, but clearly it is important that if Airbus Industrie is to add to its existing range of aircraft, it should do so in a commercially sensible way, producing the highest quality aircraft at the lowest cost, thus giving a return both to shareholders and to Governments.

Internet Terminals

12. Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many Internet terminals there are in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Germany and (c) France. [23927]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Figures are not available for terminals, but for hosts—in other words, computers directly connected to the Internet. In February 1996, the UK had more Internet hosts per head than either France or Germany, with 7.8 hosts per 1,000 inhabitants as against 5.6 for Germany and 2.4 for France.

Mr. French: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for confirming those figures, which show the UK to be in the lead in this matter. Will he tell the House what progress he has made in reaching agreement throughout Europe on putting in place arrangements to screen out certain material from the Internet and in particular whether he has had an opportunity to make an appraisal of the proposals made by CompuServe?

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising what is a difficult issue, but I must tell him and the House that Governments should tread warily in trying to control the information on the Internet, which is a network of networks that has had remarkable success largely because it has grown entirely through private initiative since its early days in the defence sector. If it is designed to survive a nuclear attack, it is likely to be resistant to Government regulation, as the German Bavarian Government found. That does not mean that there is not a large onus on the network service providers to provide a highway code for potential purchasers of software. I am encouraging them to do that, and I hope that we shall see progress over the next few weeks.

Mr. MacShane: If the Minister is so keen on the spread of information, why has his Department undertaken legal action of the most outrageous nature against Mr. Adam Raphael of The Economist to gag—

Madam Speaker: Order. "Erskine May" clearly says that a supplementary question must follow the substantive question closely. We shall move on.

Oil and Gas Reserves

13. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the latest estimate of the oil and gas reserves in the United Kingdom continental shelf. [23928]

Mr. Eggar: The reserves estimates for 1995 are still in preparation and will be published in volume 2 of the "Energy Report" later this month.

At the end of 1994, however, remaining discovered reserves were estimated to lie between 575 million and 2,075 million tonnes of oil and 660 billion and 1,915 billion cu m of gas.

Mr. Canavan: As our trade deficit would be even worse if it were not for oil and gas reserves, which have brought revenues to the Treasury amounting to a total of £137 billion in today's prices, is it not one of the greatest national scandals of our time that the Tories have frittered away most of that money instead of investing it in the nation's future?

Mr. Eggar: The considerable revenues that have flowed from North sea oil and gas have been invested in infrastructure, the health service and education—and, I might add, in repaying a fair proportion of the debts left to the country by the last Labour Government. But the most important aspect of the North sea oil and gas industry is the employment that flows from it, both directly and indirectly. It is estimated that well over 300,000 jobs depend on the industry, and many of our most technologically advanced manufacturing companies produce goods related to it.

Mr. Jenkin: How much oil and gas would have been discovered over the past 15 years if oil and gas in the North sea had remained in public ownership, and the companies concerned had remained under state control—starved of the private finance that is necessary for investment? How much revenue would we have earned, and how many losses would the Government have had to finance?

Mr. Eggar: I speak from memory, but I believe that in the late 1970s there were confident predictions from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) that the United Kingdom would be coming to the end of its oil production during the latter part of the millennium.

Energy Pre-payment Meters

15. Mr. Martlew: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to ensure that customers on pre-payment meters are not discriminated against in the competitive energy supply markets after 1998. [23930]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Competition is the best way of reducing prices and improving services for all customers. In the competitive gas and electricity markets, all customers of the current public suppliers—including those on pre-payment meters—will be free to choose their supplier.

Mr. Martlew: Is it not a fact that those with pre-payment meters now pay considerably more than those who pay by direct debit? With the freeing up of the market, what action will the Government take to protect the poor and most vulnerable from exploitation? Will they give those people hope, and say that they should be paying the least for energy? At present, those people are paying the most.

Mr. Taylor: As the hon. Gentleman says, there is evidence that, historically, additional costs have been involved in supplying pre-payment customers. However, the regulators are charged with ensuring the existence of safeguards against discrimination in the marketplace. New gas suppliers are offering savings to customers, whatever their level of consumption—an average of 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. off—and I understand that new suppliers also plan to offer savings to pre-payment customers.

Aircraft Exports (India)

16. Mr. Madden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received concerning the supply by British Aerospace to India of Hawk 100 aircraft. [23931]

Mr. Nelson: None.

Mr. Madden: India and Pakistan have gone to war over Kashmir in the past, and both countries now have a nuclear capability. Does the Minister agree that another war over Kashmir is potentially the most dangerous conflict in the world today? Given that serious situation, does he also agree that it is grossly irresponsible for Her Majesty's Government to promote sales of Hawk aircraft or other arms to either India or Pakistan? Instead of promoting arms sales, should they not press the Governments of India and Pakistan to come to the negotiating table, under the auspices of the United Nations—in line with UN resolutions—to reach a political settlement of the Kashmir dispute that would give the people of Kashmir the right to determine their own destiny?

Mr. Nelson: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern—a concern that must be felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House—about the continued unsettled, simmering situation in Kashmir. However—although it is not directly my ministerial responsibility—I must tell the hon. Gentleman that I do not necessarily accept that we should not be engaged in the sale of defence equipment to India.

I have not considered an application for a licence for the export of Hawk aircraft. We know that India requires an advanced jet, and—along with the Prime Minister and others—I have taken opportunities to commend Hawk to India. We await events, but we must follow our own licensing application procedures. We must also be careful not to do what the Labour party seems increasingly to be doing—turning down virtually every export market that we have for defence equipment.

Mr. Atkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Hawk 100 is one of the most successful aircraft of its type, built as it is partly in my constituency, and that, in export terms, British Aerospace is one of the most successful companies worldwide? Does he therefore agree that any attacks on the credibility of customers who want to buy such aircraft from such companies, as has been occurring recently in certain aspects of the British media in relation to Saudi Arabia, does nothing but damage prospects not only for the aircraft and the company but for the jobs of many people, including those in my constituency who are contributing substantially to the economy's future?

Mr. Nelson: I concur whole-heartedly with what my right hon. Friend says about British Aerospace and our specific export market in Saudi Arabia. British Aerospace is this country's top exporter and is responsible for employing 25,000 people. Yet, at every opportunity, the Opposition seem to be turning down export markets. Some of the reports, malicious and mischievous as they have been, about one of our principal markets for defence sales, the market in Saudi Arabia, have potentially been most injurious. The Government certainly do not share those views. It is a most important market to which we want to continue to supply defence and other equipment.

Manufacturing Industry

17. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next plans to meet his European Union counterparts to discuss manufacturing industry. [23933]

Mr. Lang: My colleagues and I meet our European Union counterparts regularly to discuss a range of industrial issues.

Mr. Griffiths: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, out of the 15 members of the European Union, Britain ranks 11th in manufacturing output and that, since his party has been in power, more than 40 per cent. of manufacturing jobs have been lost? What lessons does he think he can learn from all those countries whose manufacturing output is higher than that of the UK?

Mr. Lang: I do not know where the hon. Gentleman got his figures from, but he might like to know that the British economy grew faster than the Group of Seven average in 1993-94, and is expected to be ahead of the pack, along with Germany, in 1996. If he looks at investment, he will see that under this Government it has risen six times faster than it did under Labour. Indeed, alone among our main EU competitors, British companies' investment in research and development rose again last year for the fifth successive year. I simply do not recognise the picture that the hon. Gentleman is trying to paint.

Mr. Hoon: Why do the Government claim to have made Britain the enterprise centre of Europe when, according to Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development figures, only four out of the 15 EU countries have lower levels of manufacturing output, Britain is in 11th place in the EU in investment per head of population, and in trade with other European countries Britain has the worst trade deficit of every country except Greece?

Mr. Lang: I have already given the House the investment figures. On the competitiveness of the British economy, the hon. Gentleman will be aware—if he is not, he ought to be—that the British productivity growth rate was bottom of the league under the Labour party and is now at the top.

Intermediate Development Areas

18. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of Great Britain is now designated an intermediate development area. [23934]

Mr. Oppenheim: Development areas cover 16 per cent of the working population of Great Britain and intermediate areas cover a further 17.75 per cent.

Mr. Jones: Why did the Government strip my constituency so unnecessarily of full development area status? Will the Government please restore it, bearing in mind our employment problems and the fact that we are encountering problems with inward investment as a result of the lack of development status? Does the hon. Gentleman know that it was noted in my constituency that full development area status was given to a neighbouring English constituency that is represented by the former Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt)?

Mr. Oppenheim: The hon. Gentleman's constituency has benefited, and still does, from a certain amount of regional aid. Since 1983, that has helped to safeguard 10,000 jobs and attracted a number of new companies to his constituency. In November 1995, we announced that the map would not be revised again this Session. It is only just under three years since it was last revised. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would accept that we need some stability, especially to allow investors to make their long-term decisions. The other point that he should remember is that the EU limits the total area to which we are able to give coverage, and if we were to give further coverage to his constituency, it would mean a reduction in another area.

Mr. Michael Brown: I take issue with the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) for this reason. Like him, I had a development area in my constituency; but we lost it when the map was last revised—thank goodness. The fact that we lost development area and assisted area status is a tribute to the growth in the economy in my constituency. Will my hon. Friend take it from me that industry now comes to my constituency not because it has the begging bowl of development area status but because unemployment has come down? Will he tell the hon. Gentleman that the real benefit that comes when a constituency no longer has development area status is that it has a growing economy and is therefore successful?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. His constituency lost jobs in the early 1980s, and it was a difficult time. The steel industry, for example, employed a lot of people in his constituency. That industry lost billions of pounds a year under Labour. It was the world's largest loss maker, and we had a £1 billion a year deficit in iron and steel products. Now British Steel—in a country where the manufacturing base has supposedly been devastated—is the most profitable steel company in Europe, and we have a £1 billion export surplus in iron and steel products. That shows the difference between our policies and the dead hand of old Labour's industrial policies in the 1970s.

Manufacturing Industry

20. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to improve the quality of senior managers in British manufacturing industry. [23937]

Mr. Eggar: The Government have been working with a wide range of organisations to promote and improve senior management skills which are an essential component of improving competitiveness.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister will know that, apart from the low quality of Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, the most difficult barrier that our manufacturing industry faces is a scarcity of high-quality managers. Will he speak to Professor Kumar Bhattacharyya and look at the Warwick experience in terms of training high-quality manufacturing managers? We need a scheme that clones or replicates that development of qualified and specialised postgraduate managers. If we did that, we could start to repair some of the damage that the Government have done to our manufacturing sector.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman rightly pays tribute to the work of the university of Warwick, and I join him in that. He fails, however, to recognise the considerable increase in the number of graduate business schools which are developing manufacturing expertise among senior management. He fails also to pay tribute to the work done at those business schools. Any fair-minded analysis of the present state of British manufacturing industry would recognise that there has been a considerable change in the quality of management at all levels. I also pay tribute to most of the work force in British manufacturing industry, whose skills have improved dramatically since the late 1970s.

Exports

21. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the current level of exports in (a) manufacturing, (b) financial services and (c) other areas. [23938]

Mr. Nelson: In 1995, manufacturing exports were £127 billion, exports of services were £43 billion—of which £5.5 billion were net financial services—and earnings from overseas assets were £90 billion.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that success breeds success? Would it not be right to show those excellent figures all around the world? Will that not lead to more jobs being created in this country? Would that not be better than the negative attitude of Labour and the other parties, who constantly talk down the great success that our exports are having?

Mr. Nelson: The answer is certainly yes, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to the record export of goods and services and receipts from foreign investment. Those should be a matter for joy and celebration on both sides of the House, but they clearly are not. We should advertise our successes more—for example, we are now exporting more per head than Germany or Japan. That is happening not just because of business but because of the policies of the Conservative Government.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister put in the Library any information his Department has about exports to the Rabta project in Libya, alleged by some to be a chemical weapons site and by others to be major water-producing site? What is the British Government's reaction Government to the alleged refusal to send an international inspection team at the invitation of the Libyans to see what they are up to?

Mr. Nelson: I do not recognise the allegations that the hon. Gentleman makes, but I would be very happy to look into the matter and to write to him. If he then wants to table a question, I will endeavour to answer it as fully as possible.

Equitas Rescue Plan

22. Mr. Timms: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make an announcement on the Equitas rescue plan initiated by Lloyds. [23940]

Mr. Nelson: As I announced on 29 March in answer to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), I authorised Equitas on that day.

Mr. Timms: I think the Minister will confirm that this will be the biggest single reinsurance transaction in history. Given that his approval was only conditional when he made his announcement on 29 March, can he tell us when he expects to be in a position to consider giving full authorisation to the project and what he will require before he does that?

Mr. Nelson: As the hon. Gentleman will know, there were a number of conditions precedent to the full authorisation of Equitas. It will require principally a vote of the names to support the reconstruction recovery programme and the paying in of sufficient funds to capitalise Equitas not only to meet its long-term liabilities under the policies but to provide the sufficient margin of solvency that I am required to be satisfied about under the Insurance Companies Act 1982. I have set out those requirements and criteria carefully and I hope that the matters can be decided on by the autumn. That is a matter not for me but for Lloyds and Equitas in particular. When they come back to me, I will have to consider whether the conditions have been met and whether full authorisation can be granted.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): On a point of order on the rights of Back Benchers, Madam Speaker. At column 509 of the Official Report of Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday, in answer to my Question 2, the Prime Minister claimed that Sheffield city council had an uncollected debt of £558 million. In fact, the £558 million is the Government-approved borrowing requirement for housing, schools and other important things. He also said that Sheffield was a "rubbish" city council, because of its bad collection record, yet the Department of the Environment admits that Sheffield is second from the top of the big six, and has a collection rate of more than 90 per cent.

Madam Speaker: Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Michie: Is it in order for me to continue and raise the issue—

Mr. David Shaw (Dover) rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. Just a moment. Let me deal with one point at a time. The hon. Gentleman is over-anxious, as always.

If the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) seeks to make a point of order, it must be a matter of procedure for me to deal with.

Mr. Michie: It is.

Madam Speaker: Then tell me how I can deal with it.

Mr. Michie: It is a matter of misleading the House. The problem is that everything that the Prime Minister said was totally untrue. He should be asked to withdraw those remarks, and apologise to the House and the people of Sheffield.

Madam Speaker: As the hon. Gentleman and the House knows, I have no responsibility whatever for the content of answers given by Ministers at the Dispatch Box, but the hon. Gentleman has made a point and he must pursue it by other methods. He can do that by means of the Order Paper and in many other ways of which I am sure he is well aware.

Mr. David Shaw: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It has been a tradition of the House that, if a major inward investment proposal comes to this country, the Deputy Prime Minister or the President of the Board of Trade inform the House that that is the case. Can you account for the fact that no Government statement appears to be in position, yet there is an article in today's Times that suggests that hundreds of millions of pounds of inward investment are coming to the Hartlepool area?

It appears that a Member of Parliament on the Opposition Benches has been to the far east to get hundreds of millions of pounds for his area. Why is none of this money coming to other constituencies? We would all like some of that money. Could we not have a Government statement on the position?

Madam Speaker: I have not been informed that any Minister seeks to make a Government statement today. I do not always believe what I read in the newspapers. Newspaper people are often inclined not to spoil a good story with the facts.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): I raise a point of order concerning the rights of a Back Bencher. Madam Speaker, you gently rebuked me during question time when I sought to raise a question about Mr. Raphael of The Economist. How can I, under our procedure, ask the President of the Board of Trade to defend this most monstrous assault on press freedom, and, in particular, to get an assurance from him that no gagging order or further attempts against The Economist will be pursued?

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman tried to put his question in a supplementary question on question 12 which dealt with Internet terminals. He should try to put his question in the correct order, in the usual way—through the Table Office—to the appropriate Minister.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): I raise a genuine point of order concerning the procedures of the House and the ability of Back Benchers to correct misleading impressions that are given in oral questions. Madam Speaker, on three occasions recently I have given you notice when information that has been given in answers by Ministers from the Dispatch Box has been untrue or at least highly misleading.

You will recall that, yesterday, I asked a question on a serious matter involving 200 deaths from the drug paracetamol. The Minister said that there were 45 to 60 deaths. I checked with the Library, and it confirmed that my figure is correct—that there have been 220 net deaths from paracetamol alone, and that there have been 585 deaths in which paracetamol was involved. This is a matter of enormous importance. My figure is far removed from the Government's figure.

The matter that I wish to raise—I have asked the Procedure Committee to look at it—is whether we could have a period during our day in which we can raise these matters, not under bogus points of order—as occurs in other Parliaments throughout the world. We would have the opportunity to raise issues and to correct untrue impressions that have been given from the Front Bench—inadvertently or otherwise.

Madam Speaker: I have been present in other Parliaments where they have the use of zero hours, which I assume the hon. Gentleman is seeking. I would not recommend it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I have not finished my response—I have been asked a number of questions.

The hon. Gentleman has followed the correct procedure, since he has referred the matter to the Procedure Committee. He also wrote to me following the answer to his question yesterday. He followed the right procedure by writing to the Minister concerned setting out the detail, giving what he believes to be the correct figures, and asking for a correction. Perhaps he should now wait for the Minister to give a response to that letter as he wrote it only yesterday.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Order Paper, where he can table further parliamentary questions on the matter. He can also use the Order Paper to put down an early-day motion if he feels that he has been unfairly and incorrectly treated.

Mr. Dalyell: My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) ought to pursue his point in a different way. It is a matter for you, Madam Speaker, and for the Procedure Committee. It is a matter of procedure rather than substance in this case.

There is an entirely new practice in this House, whereby senior Ministers, particularly the Prime Minister, rubbish local authorities without having had the courtesy to check with those local authorities on the facts. I cannot talk about the particular case of Sheffield, as you would rule me out of order. However, there is the general issue of the elected Parliament treating elected authorities with maximum discourtesy. I think that is a matter for the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: As I said in reply to the original point of order, the Speaker of the House—as the hon. Gentleman knows, and as all hon. Members know—has no authority whatsoever in relation to the content of answers and speeches that are made in the House, including those made by Ministers. If, through the usual channels, the hon. Gentleman seeks—and the House wishes to have—a debate on this matter, it might be a good way of opening up the issue about which he is concerned.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central) rose—

Madam Speaker: Another one from Sheffield.

Mr. Caborn: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The issue that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) raised is important for the integrity of the House. Examples of the House being misled have been given this afternoon. Will you guide the House by saying that you disagree with such deliberate misleading, and that facts should be checked, because the House is being brought into disrepute?

Madam Speaker: I have made it quite clear that the Speaker has no responsibility for the content of answers given by Ministers. The Order Paper is there to be used. If hon. Members wish to make it plain in an early-day motion that they feel that incorrect information has been given, it is there for them to use it to gain publicity and to press for debates on those matters. That is the only way to pursue such points, unless hon. Members want to refer the matter to the Procedure Committee.

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you deprecate the suggestion that the House was deliberately misled, because that is out of order?

Madam Speaker: I certainly deprecate that, and it is not the case. Ministers, as well as hon. Members, are responsible themselves for the comments that they make here. It is certainly untrue that the House was deliberately misled yesterday. I would have deprecated it at the time had I thought that that was the case.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have not the exchanges involving my hon. Friends from Sheffield shown once again that the Government would not recognise the truth if it was sprayed on their eyeballs?

Madam Speaker: I do not recognise a point of order there, so we may proceed.

BILLS PRESENTED

Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, Etc)

Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Heseltine, Mr. Secretary Howard and Mr. Michael Ancram, presented a Bill to make provision for elections in Northern Ireland for the purpose of providing delegates from among whom participants in negotiations may be drawn; for a forum constituted by those delegates; for referendums in Northern Ireland; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 105.]

Commonwealth Development Corporation

Mr. Secretary Rifkind, supported by Mr. Jeremy Hanley, Mr. Michael Jack and Mr. Anthony Nelson, presented a Bill to amend section 2 of the Commonwealth Development Corporation Act 1978 to confer further powers on the Commonwealth Development Corporation; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 106.]

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Implementation

3.40 pm

Mr. Gordon McMaster (Paisley, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the coming into force of the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 relating to the appointment and rights of authorised representatives, the assessment by local authorities of the needs of disabled persons, and the procedures to be implemented when a person is discharged from hospital, and to make corresponding provision in respect of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1989.

It is almost exactly 10 years since the private Member's Bill promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) received an unopposed Third Reading. A few weeks later, the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 was given the Royal Assent and passed into law. Yet a decade later, four major sections of that Act of Parliament have still not been implemented. Those provisions would have made a tangible difference to the lives of countless thousands of disabled people and people with mental illnesses.

The Government's continued refusal to implement the law of the land is an insult to those people and their carers. But it is more than that—it is an insult to the House, and to democracy itself. Surely it cannot be right for a Government stubbornly to ignore a law passed by Parliament. A Bill that is enacted and then not acted on cannot change anything for anyone. An Act that is not put into action is reduced to empty words and broken promises. Disabled people are disappointed—and, yes, angry—that that Act is still not being fully implemented; but they are not surprised.

It is not the first time that legislation designed to improve the lives of disabled people has been passed by Parliament and ignored by Government. For example, the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, which was piloted through the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), has suffered the same fate. Many hon. Members, and countless thousands of disabled people throughout the country, deeply regret my right hon. Friend's decision not to seek re-election. The best tribute that we could pay him for his years of dedicated service to the cause of disabled people's rights would be to implement both his Act and the 1986 Act, in full and now.

Earlier today, along with hon. Members from both sides of the House, I attended the launch of a new campaign called Time to Care. Hundreds of people from all parts of the country came here to demand an urgent overhaul of care in the community. This Bill would be a significant step forward in that campaign, because it would give disabled people, people with mental illnesses and those with learning difficulties the right to have an advocate, the right to be consulted on their care, the right to be represented, and the right to have a proper assessment of their needs. A 30-minute meeting involving advocacy could rescue someone from a lifetime of misery.

When my hon. Friend the Member for, Monklands, West drew first place in the private Members' ballot more than 10 years ago, he introduced a Bill that had the support of all parties in the House. The Health Minister at the time described the Government's position as "sceptical neutrality". Following an intervention by the then Leader of the Opposition, Neil Kinnock, the day before the Bill was to be read the Third time, the Prime Minister—Mrs. Thatcher, as she was then—agreed to let it pass, subject to some redrafting.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West then found a queue of Ministers at his door—Ministers who had refused to discuss the Bill with him during the preceding months. He worked with them through the night to redraft and amend the Bill, and the next day it had an unopposed Third Reading. That is what makes the Government's failure to implement the Tom Clarke Act all the more absurd. They are refusing to implement important sections of an Act that they had a hand in drafting.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister boasted in this Chamber about the Government's record on improving the lot of disabled people. I would challenge that claim, and so would millions of disabled people. How can they be full and equal citizens if they do not enjoy the fundamental and basic right to be consulted about the services delivered to them? How can their potential be maximised if they do not have the right to be represented, when, for whatever reason, they cannot represent themselves? How can services be targeted and tailored to suit their needs, if those needs are not assessed?

The Government place great emphasis on the citizens charter. We are told that it is all about empowering individuals. That is precisely what the 1986 Act is about—empowering disabled people, people with learning disabilities and those with mental health problems to have a say in their own lives, and, where they cannot have that say, to have an advocate speak for them.

It is not only plain wrong to impose care packages on people without giving them a say in what those packages should contain: it can also be wasteful. It can be costly to provide inappropriate community care—costly to the provider, the individual and the community. We all know of cases in our constituencies of people who have been discharged from long-stay institutions and have caused problems in the community. That is bound to happen when there is no proper assessment of need.

In a recent case in my constituency, someone was discharged and given a house in a community with which he had no connection and where he felt lonely and isolated and had no one to offer support. Almost inevitably, he drifted into a life style that caused problems for his neighbours, who came to my surgery to ask for my help. Coincidentally, the person they were complaining about came to see me later the same day. It took no more than a few minutes to establish that he had family support available in another area. Had his needs been properly assessed, and had he been consulted, the situation could have been avoided.

We all know of the two separate tragedies that occurred in lion's dens because of the lack of proper assessment before discharge. But each and every day, people are discharged from long-stay institutions and find themselves in a metaphorical lion's den because their needs have not been assessed. There are increasing numbers of mentally ill people in prisons across the length and breadth of the country because the courts have nowhere else to send them. Advocacy, consultation, and, above all, the assessment of needs before discharge, would do much to avoid that situation.

[Mr. Gordon McMaster]

If we take a walk along the streets of any major city any night of the week, we see people that community care has failed. It has given them only cardboard homes and cardboard hopes. The nation is shocked at newspaper headlines about another murder or tragedy involving someone who has been discharged from a long-stay institution.

The natural reaction is to blame community care. That is wrong. It is not the concept of community care that is wrong, but the lack of support and assessment. It is a great disservice to the United Kingdom's 6.5 million disabled people, the hundreds of thousands with learning disabilities and the 7 million carers that they face this plight. It is also an appalling waste of the talents and abilities of hundreds of thousands of ordinary people, including young people, who would be willing to be voluntary advocates. They have been denied that opportunity of personal fulfillment.

All I am asking is that the examples of best practice that already exist in some places in the UK should become the norm for the entire nation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West said when he introduced his Bill in 1986, for too long disabled people have been "done unto". He was right. Disabled people craved independence then, and they still crave it now.

If the Tom Clarke Act was right and necessary in 1986, it is right and even more necessary in 1996. I call on the House to remove a blemish from its reputation, and to deliver this aspect of civil rights to our disabled people. In that spirit, I commend my Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gordon McMaster, Mr. Alfred Morris, Sir John Hannam, Mr. Gareth Wardell, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. Charles Kennedy, Mr. Dennis Canavan, Rev. Martin Smyth, Mr. John Hume, Mrs. Margaret Ewing, Mr. Peter Thurnham and Mr. Tom Clarke.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Implementation

Mr. Gordon McMaster accordingly presented a Bill to provide for the coming into force of the provisions of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 relating to the appointment and rights of authorised representatives, the assessment by local authorities of the needs of disabled persons, and the procedures to be implemented when a person is discharged from hospital, and to make corresponding provision in respect of the Disabled Persons (Northern Ireland) Act 1989: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 26 April and to be printed. [Bill 107.]

[10th Allotted Day]

Railtrack

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.51 pm

Ms Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I beg to move,

That this House, noting both the public opposition to the privatisation of the railways throughout the United Kingdom and the undertaking given by Her Majesty's Government during the passage of the Railways Act 1993 that Railtrack would remain a publicly owned company for the foreseeable future and believing that the flotation of Railtrack will damage the national interest, lead to short term profits being put before long term investment and to lower safety standards, calls upon Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the present plans for the sale of Railtrack and to conduct a thorough review with the aim of securing for the nation higher levels of rail investment, improved services and the best possible return on taxpayers' money.

The motion points out that the overwhelming majority of the population of the United Kingdom—which of course includes Northern Ireland—are opposed to the privatisation of the railways. It also draws attention to the fact that the House of Commons has never given its consent to the sale of Railtrack, which owns the track, signalling, bridges and stations that lie at the heart of the railway network.

It is notable that, during the passage of the Railways Act 1993, the House was repeatedly assured that Railtrack would remain a publicly owned company for the foreseeable future. Many quotes are available to prove that point, but I will give the House only two today. The then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), speaking on Second Reading, said:

"Outright privatisation of all the railway is not on the agenda for the foreseeable future, not least because subsidy from the taxpayer is needed, and we have made it clear that we shall continue to provide that."—[Official Report, 2 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 160.]

The then Minister of State, the right hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), speaking in Committee, said:

"Railtrack will be in the public sector for the foreseeable future".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 23 February 1993; c. 400.]

That assurance was repeated time and time again during the passage of the Railways Act 1993.

I am sure that all hon. Members will agree that rail privatisation with the core of the system remaining publicly owned is very different from privatisation with Railtrack as a private company. It is fair to say, therefore, that Parliament was misled about the Government's intention when the Railways Act 1993 was passed.

It is because we believe that the privatisation of Railtrack is deeply damaging to the national interest that we have arranged today's debate. We are aware from the Save Our Railways poll taken some months ago that, when Tory Members of Parliament were asked anonymously whether they supported rail privatisation, 20 per cent. of them said that they were opposed to it. The challenge to them today is to vote for what they know to be right, and to vote for the national interest. It will be very interesting indeed to see the strength of their consciences.

Northern Ireland is also threatened with rail privatisation, although it is on a slower track than that of the rest of the United Kingdom. Rail privatisation will obviously damage the transport system in Northern Ireland, and it will be very interesting to see how hon. Members representing constituencies in Northern Ireland vote today.

Before going any further, I should like to say a word about tax. The cost of privatising the railways amounts to an extra £106.38 for every taxpayer in the country. That is equal to an extra 1p on the basic rate of income tax. Those who are concerned to reduce taxes should therefore vote with us to halt the sale and save the taxpayer a lot of money.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley) rose—

Ms Short: I shall not give way on that point.

The costs of privatisation to the taxpayer are shockingly large. It cost the taxpayer £1 billion to prepare British Rail for privatisation. That was one-off spending, but surely the money would have been better spent improving the west coast main line, which is my line and which is falling into ever greater disrepair and becoming more unsafe and unreliable. On top of that, it is costing the taxpayer an extra £850 million every year to run the privatised structure, which is less efficient and more costly than the old British Rail. In other words, the taxpayer is paying more for a lesser service.

Under the privatised structure, the taxpayer is expected to pour £2 billion every year into the top of the system. That trickles down, providing profits for all 100 companies that British Rail has now become, but there is no accountability to the public for the expenditure of that money and no return on taxpayers' investment. As the right hon. Member for South Norfolk said when he uttered the words that I cited earlier, that is a ridiculous set of arrangements.

If we consider specifically the cost of the sale of Railtrack, we come across other major problems. There has been a big fattening up and a creation of sweeteners to get the company sold at any price, no matter the cost to the taxpayer or the damage to our railways. Thus, a company whose modern equivalent value is £6.5 billion is to be sold for an estimated £1.5 billion, which is disgraceful in itself.

In order to get the company sold, £1.46 billion of debt—money owed to the taxpayer—has been written off. An unprecedented £69 million of profits earned while Railtrack was owned by the public is to be given to shareholders who have not yet even bought a share. Nevertheless, that money is being prepared for them. Big bonuses are on offer to the top six executives if they manage to maximise short-term profits. That is the opposite of what rail needs—rail requires long-term thinking and long-term investment.

I am afraid that the damage of Railtrack privatisation goes even further. To get the company sold, track access charges have been set very high. Thus, it costs £170,000 a year in track access charges alone to put one passenger coach on the railways. That compares with £300 to £450 in vehicle excise duty for a coach on the roads. To get Railtrack sold, the costs of using rail have been set so high that there will be no expansion of rail use under the privatised structure. Given the current projections of congestion on our roads, we must get more passengers and freight on to the railways to keep the country moving and breathing in the future. Under the arrangements in place, that cannot be done.

Although the Government babble about increased investment under privatisation, the reality is that the prospectus makes it clear that there is no expectation of growth in the use of rail under the proposals. Page 29 of the prospectus states:

"Railtrack's passenger access income is unlikely to benefit materially from any increase in passenger use".

Page 30 of the pathfinder prospectus states:

"The opportunities for expanding rail freight operations are limited."

There we have it; they are the real intentions.

Mr. Dover: I am sure that every hon. Member will join the hon. Lady in wanting more passenger and freight movement on the railways, but, after 20 or 30 years of falling passenger and freight rail movements under the nationalised system, what formula has she for increasing them?

Ms Short: We will increase the amount of freight and the number of passengers on the rail network by ensuring that there are higher levels of investment and better quality, more reliable and faster services—the opposite of what is occurring under the privatisation process.

The Secretary of State for Transport (Sir George Young): I am interested to hear the hon. Lady's commitment to higher levels of investment: where will it come from?

Ms Short: We have made it clear to the Secretary of State and to others for a long time that we are interested in mobilising public-private partnerships. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) made that recommendation as shadow transport spokesman in order to secure more investment in the rail network. That is occurring in other countries, and it should happen here also.

In addition to the terribly high track access charges that will prevent expansion in rail use, another major worry with the sale of Railtrack is that it controls much valuable land: stations are situated on valuable commercial land at the centre of every town and city in this country. There is a real danger that a Railtrack interested in maximising short-term profits will seek to misuse land that is needed for rail development in order to make a quick profit. That would constitute a major breach of the national interest.

I turn now to the reports in today's press about the serious leak yesterday of the letter from the chairman and chief executive of British Rail, Mr. Welsby—a Tory appointee. He wrote to the permanent secretary of the Department of Transport complaining that the prospectus is significantly misleading. That is a very serious allegation. The issue involves the penalties that Railtrack is required to pay if it fails to keep its agreements with other railway operators.

Page 41 of the prospectus explains:

"at present performance levels, Railtrack will be making significant net payments to the train operators".

It goes on to say that Railtrack will have to make those penalty payments to train operators for things that are outside its control, such as severe weather, as well as for things within its control, such as industrial action. The prospectus states that Railtrack has been allowed an additional £75 million per year in access charges in order to cover what it might have to pay out in those circumstances.

Page 41 of the prospectus explains that the company directors, having assessed what improvements they can make to Railtrack's performance, still the amounts allowed for penalty payments in the Government's figures. That is a very serious point when considering the company's viability.

"do not believe these improvements will be sufficient to match"

At the top of page 42—hon. Members may wish to check it—the prospectus says that, under the arrangements, a single day's cessation of train services will cost Railtrack about £12 million. According to my rudimentary calculations—the sum is not difficult: even Conservative Members could do it—Railtrack has enough money put by in the £75 million allowance for fewer than seven days' loss of services. In summer 1994, services were lost for 18 days.

After the first seven days, every additional day's lost service will cost Railtrack £12 million out of its profits. The big question is: how long could Railtrack last in those circumstances? Are Mr. Horton's management skills considered so great that he can do now what he signally—if I may use that word—failed to do in 1994?

Railtrack's profit last year, as stated on page 63 of the prospectus, was £189 million before tax. If one adds to that the whole £75 million additional penalty allowance, I calculate that Railtrack's annual profit would be wiped out in 22 days.

But the position is far worse than that. Page 66 of the prospectus shows that last year, with no days of complete cessation of train services, Railtrack still paid £80 million in penalties—that is £5 million more than the £75 million that is allowed for. If one assumes that the allowance is used up by ordinary disruption—as it was last year—Railtrack's profit would be extinguished altogether after fewer than another 16 days' lost train services. That is a very serious matter.

When the chairman of the British Railways Board—I remind the House that he is a Tory appointee—writes to the permanent secretary to the Department of Transport complaining that "material information for investors" on a desperately important subject has been left out of the prospectus, the country can see for itself that the Government, who have been consistently tainted by sleaze and underhand dealings, are prepared to sell Railtrack on a false prospectus.

I am conscious that the Government are keen to shift attention from the damage that they are doing to the railways to what Labour will do about it, assuming that we win the next election. I have said before that it is rather like a vandal who is about to destroy a monument saying to the caretaker of that monument, "Tell me how you will restore the monument after I have destroyed it." The answer is simple: do not destroy the monument. How dare the Government ask us what we will do to put right the destruction that they are imposing on the nation?

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): The hon. Lady will be astonished to discover how much we agree about encouraging passengers and freight back to the railways. However, she described British Rail as a monument. Although some people are working very hard to encourage people on to the railways, unfortunately British Rail is a monument to the uselessness of a nationalised industry.

When the hon. Lady and I were born, there were 15 railway stations in my constituency. They have all been closed by nationalised British Rail. In the hon. Lady's constituency, there used to be a railway line from Handsworth towards West Bromwich, and from the centre of Birmingham near New Street station past Winson Green. Those lines were closed by nationalised British Rail. How can the hon. Lady describe British Rail as a monument?

Ms Short: The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that we are about to build a metro on that line, which runs through my constituency. That will be a lovely advancement of public transport provision for Birmingham and my constituency, and we look forward to it very much indeed.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the old British Rail was far from perfect, and that we need a higher quality model to achieve the levels of investment and the use of the railway to meet future needs; but it is absolutely clear that the old British Rail was better than the privatised model. That is proved by the fact that, each year, the Treasury has had to find an extra £850 million to provide lesser services from the privatised model than we had under British Rail. If something is imperfect, we should not make it worse; we should try to develop something better.

We in the Labour party are keen to be absolutely clear and straight with anyone contemplating investment in Railtrack. In my Swindon speech, which is printed in full in the prospectus, I set out our intentions. We want to be straight with all potential investors about the intentions of an incoming Labour Government.

I shall not dwell on those plans today, because today's aim is to halt the sale, but we have made it clear that a Labour Government will use all the levers at their disposal. We shall use the power of regulation, the power of the £2 billion subsidy, and the power to acquire ownership to reintegrate the railways under a renewed British Rail and to mobilise public and private partnership to increase investment in rail and secure the increase in passenger and freight use that the country needs.

I should say something about regulation, because many of the commentators on my Swindon speech missed an important point. We want all potential investors to be clear about our intentions.

The power of regulation over the railways is significant. The Rail Regulator is more powerful than any of the other utility regulators and his reach into the heart of Railtrack's business is far deeper. The powers exist now, and they will be useful to the new Government.

The existing mechanisms give the regulator considerable powers to secure changes to the regime as it applies to Railtrack. They do not require negotiation with Railtrack or its agreement; they can be effected, if necessary, against the wishes of Railtrack. Those changes may be made to alter Railtrack's obligations, and thus its priorities, in order to achieve the objectives of the public interest rather than those of the shareholders.

To place our hands directly and securely on those powerful levers of control and immediate change, we shall need only a simple amendment to the Railways Act 1993—to make the Rail Regulator answerable to the Secretary of State, and therefore the public interest, to a far greater extent than is now the case.

When that has been achieved, the new Labour Government will have at their disposal all—or substantially all—the means to control the economic behaviour of Railtrack in significant areas. Those include the direction of Railtrack's investment spending, controls on its access charges, restrictions on the disposal of its valuable land assets, and the possibility of a clawback on substantially all its property disposal income. I ask potential investors to look carefully at what I said about regulation in my Swindon speech, because the use of regulation to protect the national interest will change the likely rate of return to shareholders.

There it is. The sale of Railtrack will be deeply damaging to the national interest and terribly costly to the taxpayer.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid–Kent) rose—

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): He is going to join the Labour party.

Mr. Rowe: As Madam Speaker said earlier, one should not believe everything one reads in the newspapers.

Will the hon. Lady explain whether the powers that she proposes to take over Railtrack will return to profitability the company that she has just portrayed as certain to lose money?

Ms Short: The powers that I described are intended to be used to ensure that Railtrack serves the national interest, and does not seek to maximise short-term profit and damage the national interest. The powers will be used to get more investment in rail and to develop greater use of rail, which is what this country's future and its transport needs require.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): Will the hon. Lady explain why she is so proud of nationalised British Rail when, particularly under the last Labour Government in the 1970s, BR was not merely a national but an international joke?

Ms Short: That was not a terribly impressive joke, either. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was listening when I answered the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan).

The old British Rail was not perfect, but the privatised structure is worse. An incoming Labour Government will create something better. If the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins) supports the Government tonight, he will be helping to create something massively more costly and massively worse than the old British Rail. Conservative Members must face that fact.

I was saying that the sale of Railtrack will be deeply damaging to the national interest and terribly costly to the taxpayer. The privatised structure will also prevent any expansion in rail use. It is in the national interest that the sale be halted. If it is not, we are confident that an incoming Labour Government can reintegrate rail, and mobilise higher levels of investment and use. We will do that, but the present Government must take responsibility for the damage and the waste of taxpayers' money that they are causing now. The House has the opportunity today to stand up for the national interest. I hope that that opportunity is taken.

4.12 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Sir George Young): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"congratulates the Government on the progress that it is making with privatisation, with the franchising in the last three weeks alone of the InterCity East Coast, Gatwick Express and Network South Central lines, offering the prospects of better services and higher investment at less cost to tax-payers; recognises that this demonstrates that the Opposition's attempt to halt privatisation has failed; and looks forward to the flotation of Railtrack in May as a golden opportunity for the railways to gain access to the private finance necessary for investment, and for people to become real stakeholders in the railways, thanks to the Government's policy of wider share ownership".

How relieved we are that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) has been allowed to open the debate and give her overworked deputy a much-needed break. After the events of the weekend, we were concerned that the shadow Home Secretary might have dreamt up some new and terrible punishment for the hon. Lady. I quote the words of a senior Blair aide in The Guardian today:

"She accepted that she has screwed up big time."

Ms Hilary Armstrong (North–West Durham): Will the Minister give way?

Sir George Young: No, because I would like to cover a little of my journey before I pick up my first passenger.

Even the mild-mannered Opposition Chief Whip was obliged to pick up his pen to write an article that also appeared in The Guardian this morning. He used politer language, but none the less delivered a public rebuke under the trendy headline, "Don't rock the roll". We only wish that this debate could take place at 8 am on Sunday, as that is when the hon. Member for Ladywood speaks without restraint.

Ms Armstrong rose—

Sir George Young: I shall give way in a moment.

Many Conservative Members can remember the days when Labour Members might have been criticised for suggesting that taxes on middle incomes should be cut. Not long ago, Labour voted against such reductions on a three-line Whip.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Could the Secretary of State advise the House what on earth his speech has to do with the subject that we are discussing?

Madam Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State should be allowed to develop his speech. He has been on his feet for only one minute.

Sir George Young: The hon. Member for Ladywood spoke briefly about tax at the beginning of her speech. I remind the Opposition that Labour's former deputy leader, another distinguished Birmingham Member of Parliament, said:

"Labour now has a clear choice. It can be either the party of higher taxation and proud of it, or the party of higher taxes which it is ashamed to describe, afraid to admit and incapable of calculating with any accuracy. It cannot be the low taxation party."

Those are the words of a former deputy leader of the Labour party.

Ms Armstrong: Does the Secretary of State think that it was the press that gave the real comment on Tory tax policies this weekend? Was not it the electors of South-East Staffordshire?

Sir George Young: I now regret having given way on that point. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The criticisms of the hon. Member for Ladywood have not come from Conservative Members: they have come from the Labour leader's office. It is absurd for the hon. Lady to be criticised for articulating a belief that united Opposition Members when they joined the Labour party. One can but contrast the way in which the leadership embraced and protected the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) for sending her son to a grammar school and silenced the hon. Lady.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Some of us are somewhat bored with this dissertation on other matters. Could we revert to the topic of the debate?

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Madam Speaker: Order. I see the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister. We have had a good bit of knockabout and now perhaps we might revert to the amendment.

Sir George Young: I conclude my opening remarks by saying that the hon. Member for Peckham was endorsed for acting like a Tory and the hon. Member for Ladywood was rebuked for speaking like a socialist.

I welcome the opportunity presented by the debate for three reasons. First, I wish to remind the House why the Government believe that their policies for the railways are the right ones to reverse decades of decline. Secondly, now that we have made further progress with those policies—drawing in private sector funds to complement those of taxpayers, attracting into the industry fresh skills and talents to work alongside those already there and restructuring the industry so that it focuses more clearly on its customers—we can stand back for a moment, look at some of the fears that have been expressed, including some of those mentioned by the hon. Member for Ladywood, see whether they are justified and examine the achievements to date. Thirdly, I wish to contrast the clear vision that we have of tomorrow's railway, and our resolution to secure it, with the muddled, divided views of the Labour party and the trade unions that support it and the vagueness of their purpose. Then I wish to ask the House who is more likely to deliver the expanding, confident, well-resourced railway that the whole House wants to see.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir George Young: In a moment.

Which is more likely to deliver? Is it a party that opposes privatisation and thereby denies Railtrack access to fresh funds and, at the same time, refuses to make similar funds available from the public sector? That party offers no future to the railways.

Mr. MacShane rose—

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) rose—

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin) rose—

Sir George Young: I shall give way to the hon. Member for—

Madam Speaker: Halifax?

Sir George Young: No, to the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott).

Mr. Grocott: If the Secretary of State is determined to persist with the sale of the land and assets of Railtrack, which currently belong to my constituents, to me and to the whole of the population of this country, against our wills, can he at least tell us when we shall each receive the cheque for the sale of our assets and how much it will be?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman knows that Railtrack will be sold at the end of May. There will be a receipt for the taxpayer that goes into the Exchequer. He also knows that under a privatised railway, the costs of funding investment will no longer fall on the taxpayer. They will fall on the privatised railway. I hope to show that investment in the railway will increase at a faster rate than if it had remained in the public sector. That is the kernel of the case for privatisation.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Will my right hon. Friend confirm, in setting the context of the debate, that the five franchises that have so far been let will all be run at a lower cost by those who have taken them than the cost at which British Rail runs them, and will all provide better services for my constituents?

Sir George Young: I hope to make exactly that point.

Several hon. Members rose—

Sir George Young: No, I shall not give way. I want to make some progress. I shall not give way for the time being.

Mr. Home Robertson: I want to be helpful.

Sir George Young: Even with that kind offer, I am not giving way to the hon. Gentleman for the moment.

When the House voted the Railways Bill on to the statute book in 1993, it took a decisive step to reverse the historic decline of the railways. That decline, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) said in an intervention, had seen the industry's share of the market shrink from 17 per cent. in 1953 to 5 per cent. now. Its share of the freight market had dropped even more dramatically. The era of nationalisation was marked by poor industrial relations, low productivity, rising fares and an attitude towards passengers and freight business that was often patronising. It is hardly surprising that those users stayed away.

The old railway was a monolithic, monopolistic, slow-moving nationalised industry, which never had the inclination or the initiative to focus on the needs of its passengers and freight users. Yet it was an industry full of talented and committed people, shored up with vast quantities of taxpayers' money.

How did the industry fail? It failed because it was insulated from commercial pressures. It failed also because, as a public monopoly, it never had to confront long-term competitive challenges from other forms of transport. Similarly, it failed because it looked inwards at itself, not outwards towards its market, both passengers and freight. Taxpayers' money went into the industry and disgruntled users came out.

British Rail failed to recognise the golden rule of service industries: the customer is king. There were several attempts to solve the problem by throwing money at it. But cash alone could not and cannot halt the railways' downward slide. The basic problem was structural rather than financial.

Mr. Robathan: My right hon. Friend will have heard British Rail compared recently with a monument. To what does he think British Rail would be a monument?

Sir George Young: It is a monument to post-war public industry, a monument that is now out of date. There are better ways of running our railway system than having it as a monument. Our policy, as set out in the Railways Act 1993, was directed to the problem for the first time. Its basic message was that the railway system could revive its fortunes only if it were given commercial incentives to win back passengers and freight. The policy built on the successes of previous privatisations, from British Telecom to British Airways. It adapted the main features of those privatisations to the unique circumstances of the railway industry.

The Act brought in a new era, in which private sector dynamism could replace years of public sector stagnation. It introduced a new regulatory system to protect the public interest. It represented a recognition that investment in a publicly owned body would always have to compete with investment in health and education. By placing the railways firmly in the private sector, we would be able to free investment from that constraint.

Mr. MacShane: In the wonderful world that the Secretary of State is describing, why is the franchising director saying that the number of services to Doncaster from London will be cut by half under privatisation? That is a deplorable attack on the business community in South Yorkshire.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman has confused the passenger service requirement with the level of service that emerges at the end of the franchising process.

Our policy recognised that other transport operators—ferries, buses and airlines—might have skills that could help regenerate an important but declining industry. That was the philosophy behind the 1993 Act. Nothing has happened in the past three years to challenge either our analysis or proposed solution.

I now come to the progress to date. We have been fed a constant diet of scare stories on rail privatisation by the Opposition, and by others: that fares would escalate; services would be cut; investment would fall; the railways would be less safe; people would not bid for the franchises; the Labour party would stop the flotation of Railtrack; and, if it did not, no one would want to buy the shares. I shall go through those accusations and contrast the rhetoric with the reality.

Passengers were told that their services would be cut. The fact is that the franchises awarded so far are all based squarely on existing levels of service. South West Trains has already introduced new co-ordinated bus links to rail stations and embarked on a £3 million programme of improvements to station and passenger facilities such as security, lighting, waiting rooms and information services. It also plans to improve business travel services, to offer new concessions for senior citizens and to restore or expand services to Epsom, West Croydon, Southampton and Salisbury.

Great Western plans to introduce more trains, faster journey times, refurbished rolling stock, a Motorail service between London and the west country, new bus links to rail services, increased capacity for bicycles and a radically improved telephone inquiry service. London and South Coast, which won the Network South Central franchise, plans to introduce new services in south London.

The Gatwick Express franchisee has similar improvements planned: a better passengers charter, new off-peak discounts, and on-board check-in facilities for club class passengers.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I thank the Secretary of State for giving way, as he flashed through my region so fast that I could hardly catch his eye. I refer him back to South West Trains. As some constituency examples have already been given, I hope that he will bear with me. Is he aware that the 8.50 train from Waterloo to Poole, which should have passed through Eastleigh this morning at approximately 9.30, was, unfortunately, mistakenly signalled on to the Salisbury line? One does not have to be a railway buff to know that the line from Waterloo to Weymouth, which goes through Poole, is electrified. The line to Salisbury is not. So, consequently, the train ground to a halt just west of Basingstoke, where the staff on the train led passengers to safety by torchlight. Is that the new, modern railway that the Secretary of State talks about?

Sir George Young: The crucial difference between the new regime and the old is that, under the old regime, there would have been no commercial penalty on British Rail whatever. Under the new regime, there are financial incentives on Railtrack and on the franchise operator for trains to run on time. For the first time, we have a commercial structure that will reward operators that run trains punctually and penalise those that do not. That incentive never existed with British Rail.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Sir George Young: I shall give way once more, but then I must make some progress.

Mr. Tredinnick: Is my right hon. Friend aware that some of the improvements that Great Western proposes were also proposed by the Great Western Railway in 1946, but were never implemented while the industry was nationalised?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend makes a powerful case for the reinvolvement of the private sector in the railways, and I am grateful to him.

Passengers were also told that they would lose key network benefits, but the fact is that through tickets, discount cards for the young, the elderly and disabled people, impartial sales information and the telephone inquiry network are legally safeguarded as a result of privatisation. We were then told that franchising would drive up fares. The fact is that for the first time ever, as an integral part of privatisation, key fares such as saver tickets and standard weekly seasons have been capped. They have been pegged to inflation since January and will begin to fall below inflation in just over two years. Contrast that with a real increase of 22 per cent. under the previous Labour Government.

Everyone has been told by the Opposition that investment would fall off once services were franchised. The fact is that each of the new franchisees plans new investment in the network: refurbished rolling stock, upgraded passenger security and better facilities for disabled people. The National Express group, which will run the Gatwick Express service, plans to have completely new rolling stock by 1999. Great Western will refurbish its entire fleet of high-speed trains. The franchisee on the InterCity east coast line plans to spend more than £17 million on service enhancements, including £7 million on improvements to the reliability of the class 125s, new passenger lounges and passenger security.

Ms Armstrong rose—

Sir George Young: I shall certainly not give way to the hon. Lady again. It is nothing personal.

The Network South Central franchisee, London and South Coast, will spend a further £10 million over the next three years on improvements to rolling stock and stations.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir George Young: Not now; I might do so later.

I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the franchising director announced today that shortlisted bidders for the South Eastern franchise would be asked to bid on the basis of a 15-year franchise, and that their proposals should include the replacement within three years of all 83 of South Eastern's class 411 units, most of which are concentrated on the Kent coast line.

Mr. Rowe: Has my right hon. Friend any idea of the number of occasions on which Kent Members have either visited or written to the directors of British Rail demanding the upgrading of rolling stock? Does he realise how much glee will greet one of the first fruits of privatisation—the fact that the rolling stock that British Rail consistently refused to give us has now been promised?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend's prayers have been answered. I know that he and many other Kent Members, some of whom are present—my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) is not; he is in a Select Committee—will welcome this afternoon's announcement by the franchising director.

Ms Short: The trouble is that reality is completely different from the promises that are made. Can the Secretary of State explain why, if there are so many new orders, there has been a massive slump in investment? The ABB carriage works in York have closed, and all the rail manufacturing companies are laying off skilled workers and are desperately concerned about their future. Reality is not as the Secretary of State describes it.

Sir George Young: The key difference between the hon. Lady and me is that I am able to make an announcement that will have no impact on public expenditure. The hon. Lady can make no such commitment, because she is committed to public sector procurement, and her hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) will not allow her to make a commitment such as the one that I have just made to the House.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): My constituents—Kent commuters—will benefit enormously from my right hon. Friend's announcement. The county of Kent has battled long and hard. When does my right hon. Friend expect the new trains to be in service?

Sir George Young: They will be available within three years. I am delighted that the private sector has been able to provide what the public sector could not.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir George Young: No. I want to make some more progress.

The franchisee will also be required to put forward proposals to replace all the remaining 95 units of slam-door rolling stock. That will mean that, together with the new Networkers already operating on the inner suburban services, South Eastern will have a completely updated fleet. As we have just heard, my hon. Friends who represent the people of Kent have argued for many years that more rolling stock investment is needed on their rail services, and franchising will give them that investment.

We have sold the three passenger rolling stock leasing companies to increase the possibility of new and refurbished rolling stock. In the short time during which they have been in the private sector, one of those companies, Angel Train Contracts, has announced a £400 million funding facility for new train building and refurbishment. In addition, on 2 April Porterbrook Leasing announced a £75 million-plus programme of refurbishment to its mark III fleet, which is good news for service on mainly the cross-country, midland main line and west coast main line.

We were told that franchising would cost taxpayers more. In fact—as my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) implied—the first five franchises alone will be funded in the private sector, by year seven of the franchises, to the tune of £95 million, compared with British Rail's current £300 million. That is over one third of the franchises costing taxpayers over two thirds less. GNR even plans to need no subsidy at all by the end of its franchise. The Gatwick services will pay taxpayers a growing dividend year by year. By any standard, that represents a huge reduction in the cost to taxpayers of running rail services. If savings on that scale are repeated throughout the country, in a few years, the subsidy bill for the railways will be reduced substantially.

Mr. Hawkins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what he has just said once again shows the success that this privatisation will be, in taking the burden away from the taxpayers, producing profits for them and improving services, just as the privatisations of British Telecom and British Airways did? Does he also agree with my prediction that very shortly the Labour party will realise how successful and popular privatisation is, as it did with British Telecom and British Airways, and its policy will change such that it will claim that it was its idea all along?

Sir George Young: We might have to wait a year or two before that flash of inspiration. My hon. Friend is right. Not only will privatisation reduce the cost to taxpayers, but it will improve services and there will be more investment by the franchisees. So it is a win-win situation.

We were told that safety would be jeopardised by privatisation. Railways continue to be the safest form of land transport. The independent Health and Safety Commission has confirmed that there is no evidence of any overall decline in health and safety standards since Railtrack was set up. Indeed, recent statistics show some improvement in safety standards. In 1994-95, the number of significant rail accidents fell and total fatalities on the network, excluding trespassers and suicides, fell to their lowest ever level.

Railtrack has made it clear that safety is its first priority. It is in the company's commercial interests to provide demonstrably safe service to attract and retain customers. British Airways' move to the private sector has not compromised safety. I should make it clear once again that I am not complacent about safety. I expect it to remain the paramount concern of everyone in the rail industry.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Secretary of State will know that the Health and Safety Executive has published a report on the Forth rail bridge, the south end of which is in my constituency. Paragraph 100 of its report says:

> "While the general condition of the bridge does not give rise to immediate concern in respect of its carrying capacity, some members have suffered a loss of section due to corrosion to an extent which makes repair or replacement necessary as part of a planned maintenance strategy."

Apart from the fact that the bridge is the greatest monument to 19th-century civil engineering anywhere in Europe, the entire question of the railway system north of the Forth should be addressed. Will the Minister who winds up give a considered answer about how the Government view the financing of the work that the Health and Safety Executive thinks is of great importance?

Sir George Young: I shall certainly see that my hon. Friend the Minister gives the hon. Gentleman the considered reply for which he has asked. As I am sure the hon. Gentleman knows, the HSE report confirmed that the bridge is safe. Railtrack fully accepts that the bridge requires a thorough maintenance regime and it is fully committed to the HSE recommendations.

We were also told that Labour would stop privatisation. It said that it would stop us in the Division after Christmas; it has said that it will stop us today, and it will be wrong again.

Then we were told that nobody would want to buy shares in Railtrack. On Monday, we published the pathfinder prospectus, announcing the sale of substantially all the Government's shares in the company and giving details of the first instalment—

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) rose—

Sir George Young: I should like to finish this paragraph before giving way to the hon. Gentleman, and then I must make some progress. We also gave details of the timetable. Further pieces of the jigsaw will be put in place over the next two weeks, culminating in the publication of a price-ranged prospectus on 1 May. The public will then have another two weeks to apply. We expect the start of dealings on 20 May. One million prospective shareholders are now registered with share shops. They are ordinary investors like all those who have followed and supported the Government's programme of privatisations since we took office, which is why there are almost 10 million shareholders compared with fewer than 3 million in 1979.

The Daily Telegraph reported yesterday:

> "One of the largest stockbrokers in the country, Sharelink, said the number of people registering for the sale next month was already twice its expectation".

So much for the Labour party's claims that the public are not interested in the privatisation.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) referred to the letter that the chairman of British Rail sent to the permanent secretary at the right hon. Gentleman's Department on 2 April, which stated categorically that the prospectus was deficient and misleading in many highly significant and influential respects. Since then, no alteration has been made to the prospectus. As the chairman of British Rail and the prospectus cannot both be telling the truth, does the Secretary of State agree that a stock exchange inquiry is required to find out the truth?

Sir George Young: Certainly not. Mr. Welsby was responding to a request from my Department as part of the process of writing the prospectus. We received a comprehensive response from British Rail, which has been considered carefully as part of the process of finalising the prospectus. For example, the prospectus now contains a full statement by the Rail Regulator, setting out his views on investment. Railtrack has addressed British Rail's specific concerns on the west coast main line modernisation. The directors of Railtrack Group plc have a duty to ensure that, to the best of their knowledge and belief, the information in the prospectus is in accordance with the facts and contains no material omissions. I am confident that the prospectus issued on 1 May will fully satisfy those requirements.

Rail staff will also benefit from share ownership. Railtrack's staff will be offered special share offers, such as free shares, up to £500, plus more for each year of service, and discounts of 20 per cent. Great Western last month offered more than half the shares in the company that won the franchise to all its staff. Those on offer were priced at 50p with a minimum stake of £100, and the company is so keen to encourage its staff that it is matching the first 200 shares purchased. That is what Conservative Members call real stakeholding.

I am sure that many trade union members, who sponsor so many Opposition Members, will take up those offers. As The Guardian put it yesterday,

"For those prepared, however, to put the moral outrage to one side and consider Railtrack's possibilities in the private sector, the prospects could be quite alluring. It is a classic utility business with possibilities for ratcheting down costs through new technologies such as modern signalling systems; ending Spanish practices in the labour force and outsourcing some services. Who knows, Railtrack, like another transport firm British Airways, could well prosper in the private sector."

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir George Young: I shall give way one more time, and then I propose to make progress.

Mr. Hill: I presume that the Secretary of State is an enthusiastic fan of the £69 million flotation sweetener out of the so-called "profits" of Railtrack. Can he inform the House where those profits have arisen from? Is he aware that, last year, Railtrack salted away £150 million out of its maintenance programme? That money, which should have been spent on maintenance, is now being distributed to potential shareholders. Will not the motto of Railtrack in future be, "Putting profits before passengers"?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman knows that Railtrack is heavily regulated, and has been told by the regulator to reduce the access charges that it charges the train-operating companies. The companies will be operating within a tough regulatory regime. No money is "salted away", to use his expression—that money is needed to invest in, modernise and improve the nation's railways. The existence of the dividend will impact on the value of the shares when they are floated, so that the interests of the taxpayer will be fully safeguarded.

Sir Michael Grylls (North–West Surrey): Will my right hon. Friend be gentle with the Opposition, as this is a sad day for them? They are seeing the last of the great state corporations demolished and returned to the private sector. He should be sensitive, if I may say so. It is a happy day for the traveller, but a sad one for the Labour party.

Sir George Young: Even sadder is the fact that Labour cannot give a commitment to buy it back, and I shall say a word about that in a moment.

Having disposed of some of the myths, let us look at the reality. Nearly half the rail industry—some £4 billion-worth by aggregate turnover—has been transferred to the private sector. That is made up of 51 businesses, including the five franchises that we have awarded so far. We have sold the three rolling stock companies, as the press has reported, for £1.8 billion. We have made good progress with the sale of BR's freight businesses. Rail Express Systems and the trainload freight companies have been bought by North and South Railways, a consortium led by Wisconsin Central Transportation. Wisconsin has a wealth of railway experience from around the world and will bring new ideas and successes to rail freight in Britain. It has plans to invest heavily in new locomotives. In the private sector, those businesses will have commercial incentives to win freight traffic from the roads.

The public want an improved railway service, and the key to that will be the sustained programme of expenditure on the infrastructure that Railtrack intends to undertake. That expenditure amounts to some £9 billion at current prices over the next five years—a significantly higher level of expenditure than Railtrack has managed under the public ownership and public accountability so beloved of Opposition Members. In practice, that expenditure could not be achieved without substantial private sector finance. I believe that Railtrack's privatisation will unlock the barriers to that private investment in our railway infrastructure. Those are the facts.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir George Young: No. I said that I had given way for the last time, and I meant it. I have given way fairly generously in the course of my remarks.

Let me return finally to the alternative—to the policy vacuum on the Labour Benches. Last winter, we were treated to the unedifying sight of the Labour party in search of a policy for rail. It was like a tank engine, going backwards and forwards in a goods yard. That culminated in the speech in Swindon last month by the hon. Member for Ladywood, purporting to explain Labour's ideas. That speech was an insult to a great railway town. If her doom-laden analysis of the railways is right, her solution is wholly inadequate. If it is wrong, her solution is irrelevant. Either way, her speech in Swindon was incoherent intellectually and financially.

The rhetoric of old Labour, with its party conference call for public ownership, sits uneasily with the so-called reality of new Labour and the avoidance of commitments. Its policy statement said much about the tensions in the Labour party, but very little about the needs of a modern railway. First, Labour Members talk of an integrated railway system. What do they mean by that? Under this Government, we have increased the integration of the railways into other transport systems. We have opened new lines such as the Robin Hood line in Nottinghamshire. We have opened more than 200 stations, whereas under Labour more than 600 were closed. Thanks to the private train operator, South West Trains, we now have new bus services in Hampshire linking towns to those with train stations. That is what any sensible person would call an integrated transport system. And, of course, we are extending the rail network, and knitting it closer together, with Thameslink 2000 and the channel tunnel rail link, taken forward by a private sector company under our private finance initiative.

Then the hon. Member for Ladywood talks of a "reconstituted British Rail". There will not be much, if anything, left of British Rail to reconstitute by the time of the next general election. Much of what was British Rail Labour has agreed not to buy back. We have already got about £5 billion-worth of the old BR either sold or on the market, with the remainder following on apace.

Let us recall Labour's views on all this. It has already said that it will not break any contracts. That means that, even if Labour was in office, it could not renationalise the franchises, which could remain privately run, for the life of the next Parliament. It has also said that it would not buy back the rolling stock, the freight or the maintenance units. It is now in the absurd position of claiming to be opposed to the flotation of Railtrack, while at the same time refusing to say whether it would buy it back. Under a Conservative Government, it says that Railtrack must be publicly owned. But, if there were a Labour Government, it could remain privately owned. Where is the sense or logic in that?

Then the hon. Member for Ladywood promised tougher regulation. I wonder whether she has seen the article in The Independent on 15 April. Under the headline, "Labour to woo British Gas by scrapping regulator", we see a different line from the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). The article says:

"He is keen to stress that those in his party who have what he terms 'a 1940s to 1960s mindset' will have their hopes of possible renationalisation dashed, and that it is crucial that the regulatory framework is simplified to make the companies' lives easier."

He is quoted as saying:

"I do not want them to be like Gulliver, tied down with millions of little ropes. That is the problem with over-regulation. Provided they maintain their social obligations the size of their profits is up to them."

The hon. Lady is promising more regulation, while one of her colleagues is promising less regulation of another former nationalised industry. It is small wonder that neither the travelling public—

Ms Short rose—

Sir George Young: I shall not give way to the hon. Lady as I have already done so—I have given way for the last time.

It is no wonder that neither the travelling public nor the City has taken much notice of the Labour party's rail proposals. Indeed, The Sunday Times reported last week:

"Labour's transport spokeswoman has huffed and puffed, but has failed to blow rail privatisation down."

A lot of people want to know about the Labour party's policies on fares, services, public subsidy and investment. The Labour party talks glibly of higher levels of investment, but it does not say where the money would come from—perhaps from higher taxes on Members of Parliament?

We are the only party with a clear strategy to bring more investment into the railways—from the private sector, not from the taxpayer. Perhaps the hon. Lady would rather have higher borrowing. Or would she do what Labour did before and close branch lines and stations? The hon. Lady clearly admires the French railways. I read a flattering article that appeared in The Guardian today, in which she stated:

"I have assembled a policy which will give us a better railway . . . It'll be like the French side of the Channel Tunnel".

I wonder whether she is aware that the French railways announced earlier this year that they are £27 billion in debt. Is that a model that we should seek to emulate? Perhaps her investment pledge would be paid for out of higher fares. The Labour party has never said what it would do about fares. Does the hon. Lady think that fares should be higher, to finance more spending on the railways? Or should they be lower, to encourage more people to travel by train? Or will she admit—as she has done with much of the rest of our privatisation policy—that we have got it about right? We hope to get an answer from the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), a man of less ambition than the hon. Lady—while she wants my job, he just wants hers.

I strongly believe that the railways should have a more important role in tomorrow's transport world, and I believe that our policies will secure that role. I have no confidence that the Labour party knows what to do with the railways. The Labour party is ashamed of its past, silent on its future and not fit to govern. I urge my hon. Friends to join me in voting tonight to ensure a better future for the railways, for taxpayers and for Britain.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I shall concentrate on one narrow but desperately important aspect: the future of the Forth bridge. It is not just any bridge—it is the greatest monument to engineering of the 19th century. The whole railway network depends on the Forth bridge—to Fife, Dundee, Aberdeen, the North sea oil industry, Inverness and points north. This is not a trivial matter.

I am glad to have the Secretary of State's attention because I do not put this issue forward in a partisan way. I recall that it was action in the House that shamed the Health and Safety Executive and Ministers into having a report that was conducted under distinguished engineers. I shall make my points from the results of the report. My hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), the former Secretary of the National Union of Miners, Scotland, who knows a good deal about engineering, and my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe), who was a steel worker before he came to the House of Commons, and I were cautiously taken over the bridge by Paul Prescott, the director of Railtrack. One just cannot wander on to the bridge—the up trains and the down trains have to be stopped. We were treated most courteously in being taken over to see for ourselves.

I have loved the bridge since childhood and I was shocked by whole globules of paint coming off and by rust setting in—after all, rust never sleeps. I was shocked when I went up to the Jubilee, or South tower to examine the mess—which is called the guano in the report—in many of the nooks and crannies. It may be that no damage has been done yet, but cosmetic damage soon ceases to be cosmetic.

First, I shall concentrate on the condition of the bridge. The report states:

"Although some corrosion was found on the primary structure members, it was judged that the level of corrosion found was not significant in the structural analysis."

I do not want to be alarmist—and here I share the view of the Secretary of State—but

"The level of corrosion on some of the secondary members which brace the main structural members, was found to be higher with significant section loss having occurred. Although not critical to the present structural integrity of the bridge, these damaged members need to be repaired or replaced. Repairs of this nature have routinely been carried out to the bridge in the past."

The expression "being painted like the Forth bridge" has crept into the language but there is a problem. For 90 years, painting was done in the traditional way with slings. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) will know that several families around South Queensferry, which he knows well, for generations devoted their lives to the maintenance of the bridge. The Marshall family of Dalmeny station lost both husband and son on different occasions in painting the bridge. A good deal of blood has been spent, not only by the builders but by the maintainers.

I am the first to say that the Health and Safety Executive was justified in introducing new regulations but, of course, they make maintenance of the bridge more difficult and more expensive than when it was done by the old ways. My reply is that, with modern materials—especially fibreglass materials—it should, with money, be possible to conduct that maintenance. I must impress on senior Ministers that once rust gets a grip of any of the major structures, heaven knows what the cost would be of repairing it or whether it could even be done. If ever a domino theory were to operate, it would be in that complicated structure.

Mr. Dover: Does the hon. Gentleman accept from me, as a civil engineer and Chair of the Select Committee that considered the Severn second bridge, that much more extensive repairs were necessary on the Severn bridge? They were done by Laing-Entrepose, a private sector UK-French joint consortium, at a cost of tens of millions of pounds which was obtained by charging river crossing tolls. That paid not only for the repair work but for a new crossing, which is to be handed back to the Government after 20 years. Is there any difference between that and what the Government propose for the Forth bridge? A privatised company will levy the Railtrack charges to make sure that the repairs are done more than effectively.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman rendered a service to the House in his studies of the Severn bridge. The Severn bridge is not unlike the Forth road bridge. I am told by Professor Paul Jowett of the department of engineering at Heriot-Watt university and some of his colleagues that it would be much easier to repair the Forth road bridge—and, therefore, a bridge of the Severn type—than it would be to repair a structure of the 1880s and 1890s, when techniques and materials were very different. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will accept that it is a different problem. It is certainly an exceedingly expensive problem.

The report also referred to the problem of access to the tubes, which is through small inspection hatches. It continues:

"the tubes themselves are confined spaces. In the areas inspected by Pell Frischmann"— the firm that carried out the work—

"the steel was found to be in good condition and it is considered that there is no significant corrosion inside the tubes. The inspection hatch covers were removed some time ago and, as a result, there is an accumulation of guano and other detritus which needs to be removed."

I gather that removal would be quite expensive.

I have a greater concern, which has arisen since publication of the report. Rightly or wrongly, Scottish Power had the idea of floodlighting the bridge. A number of holes had to be bored in the old structure to arrange for floodlighting. I have not seen the holes because access is impossible, but I am told by John Watson, the ferryman, who has an honourable record of campaigning for the maintenance of the bridge, and his successor Colin Aston that it is likely that rust is forming in the holes drilled for the wiring of the floodlights. Since I have this unexpected opportunity, I ask the Government formally to produce within a month or two at least some considered opinion from the Health and Safety Executive on that new development.

Paragraph 94 of the report continues:

"From the consideration of fatigue loading by Pell Frischmann, the HSE was satisfied that the structural integrity of the primary bridge structure was not being adversely affected by fatigue and a considerable fatigue life still remained. Any damage which was occurring was to the railway track supporting structure or to deck plates both of which are capable of being repaired."

In his reply, I want the Minister to make it clear who will be responsible for that work in the short term.

I am not in the habit of criticising individuals on the Floor of the House and I will certainly not criticise Paul Prescott, who is well known to Ministers, for saying so, but he told my hon. Friends the Members for Midlothian and for Cunninghame, North, "If money is available, you had better understand that the Forth bridge is my third or fourth priority. My top priority is the signalling system outside Bearsden and the bridge is rather far down the list". If that is Railtrack's view, given the HSE report, where do the Government think that the bridge should come in the list of priorities?

I will list a few of the HSE's conclusions.

Mr. Wilson: On the question of who is going to pay, will my hon. Friend join me in rejecting the idea that the Forth rail bridge, which has been maintained as railway property for generations, should become a monument to be financed, not by the railway authorities but by some organisation responsible for historic buildings and monuments, which is another idea that has been floated by Railtrack?

Mr. Dalyell: I do not want to be too personal, but my wife is a member of the Ancient Monuments Board and the Royal Fine Art Commission, which will certainly not have the resources. They do think that it is their job to finance out of their limited funds work that could be extremely expensive.

It has to be made clear to prospective purchasers of Railtrack that the organisation has the obligation of spending a great deal of money—we are not talking peanuts—on the bridge over the next five years. That ought to be made clear in any prospectus. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North that I hope that it will be made very clear that the financial obligation for the Forth bridge should be included in any prospectus put to prospective shareholders.

I do not want to abuse the time of the House, but I must draw the Minister's attention to the following recommendations. Recommendation 99 states:

"The condition survey revealed a significant deterioration in the paint coating on the bridge. A more satisfactory protective coating system to the traditional paint needs to be developed and the protection restored as part of a planned maintenance strategy."

Has Railtrack—and Bob Horton in particular—accepted that there will be a planned maintenance strategy such as that envisaged by the HSE?

When the Secretary of State courteously gave way, I raised recommendation 100, so we can take that as read and in Hansard. Recommendation 101 concerns the principal roller bearings. I am told by engineers—I think that the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) will bear this out—that the bearings are crucial in the life of the whole structure. The HSE recommendation states:

"The principal roller bearings at the north and south portals do not appear to be functioning as intended and there is some evidence of past damage and repair. The structural analysis indicates that this does not at present affect the integrity of the structure. Further consideration needs to be given as to how these bearings are actually functioning and how they may be restored to an acceptable condition. HSE recommends that a system for monitoring the movements of all bearings should be instituted."

Is that going to be Railtrack's responsibility? Some Railtrack personnel have told me that the bearings have not been functioning for some time and so it is a historic obligation that should be taken on using Scottish Office funds. I asked the Scottish Office if it had the money to do the work and it said that it was not in its budget. Who is responsible for the bearings?

Recommendation 102 continues:

"Although the knuckle pin bearings at the 'fixed' ends of the suspended spans are not correctly aligned to the structure by modern design, the structural analysis indicates that this does not compromise the structural integrity of the bridge. The 'rocking posts' at the 'free ends' of the suspended spans appear to be capable of functioning but no means of lubrication was observed. Further consideration needs to be given to what action is required to ensure the continued acceptable operation of these bearings."

I do not suggest that it is the business of the Secretary of State to go out with a lubricating can or to be personally responsible for the lubrication of a particular bridge, but it is fair to ask Ministers how that work is to be done and whether they are prepared to ensure that it is.

Recommendation 103 states:

"The bearings at the base of the skewbacks appear to be seized. Analysis has demonstrated that this lack of movement has no significance with regard to the structural integrity of the bridge."

But, recommendation 104 continues:

"The lubrication system of the bearings on the approach viaducts does not appear to be functioning and further consideration of this aspect is necessary."

I am told by other engineers that, in terms of the long-term life of the bridge, the position and functioning of the bearings along the lines that the builders intended has been somewhat underestimated by the HSE inspectors and that that ought to be considered.

Recommendation 105 states:

"Cracks identified in the rail troughs should be repaired in the near future. The integrity of the previous repairs should be investigated. Any repairs and the repositioning of the longitudinal timbers over the transoms should be undertaken as part of a planned maintenance strategy. Similarly the tears in the deck plates need to be repaired."

Again it is the same question: who will finance the repairs? I hope that the Minister will say at 9.30 tonight that the hon. Member for Linlithgow and his colleagues need have no worries that Railtrack is undertaking the total financial responsibility of the HSE report.

In the hours that the Minister has between now and making his closing remarks, I hope that he will take the opportunity to get on to Railtrack, which has been well appraised of the problem, and ask Bob Horton, or whomsoever, what they are prepared to undertake. I think that the House of Commons is entitled to know the future of what is not only a vital link to the north of Scotland but the greatest monument to British, European or world engineering of the 19th century.

I thank hon. Members for their courtesy in hearing me.

5.10 pm

Sir David Madel (South-West Bedfordshire): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Later in my speech I should like to say something about safety on the railways, although not so much in relation to the topics that he mentioned.

Railway privatisation, as has been said by hon. Members, has been the most difficult and complicated privatisation ever undertaken, although it has been one of the smallest. Rail travel affects many people's lives daily, but, in view of the furious political controversy over privatisation, it is bound to be some time before the public can judge whether they think that it has been a success.

The Government have quite understandably drawn attention to the fact that they will save money in the short and long terms, not only because of the sale but because of the declining subsidies that they will have to pay.

As a start, I suggest that the public would strongly support the proposal that the money that is saved should be recycled back into other parts of the transport system. I am in no sense advocating more motorways or the endless widening of existing ones. We have known for some time that there is virtually no new road-building programme planned for London.

The current situation, however, leaves one aspect of transport policy still requiring urgent attention. If the House will excuse me for a few seconds, I shall of course refer to the bypasses that are vitally required round so many of our towns.

Transport Ministers, who have listened to me very patiently over the years, will understand why I shall take this opportunity to make a short, sharp further plea to get started on Dunstable's bypass. I know that it cannot be started overnight, but the sooner we at least start the pre-public inquiry conference and then the public inquiry into that bypass, the sooner morale in the town will be lifted—not least because of the current acute local economic difficulties that are much tied up with our transport system.

I should also like to raise briefly another local matter, which is of direct relevance to Railtrack. I hope that Railtrack, once floated, will want to expand its asset base by re-opening disused railway lines and generating business and profits from them. We have such a disused line in my constituency, between Dunstable and Luton, with track and rails already there and a powerful local campaign in place to get it re-opened.

Re-opening the line will of course cost a bit of money, and I agree that it cannot be accomplished overnight. I hope, however, that Railtrack will do an early feasibility study on the value of opening that railway so that people in Bedfordshire can know whether it has any plans or desire to make use of that existing infrastructure. I cannot think of a more environmentally friendly way in which to try to solve some of our problems in Bedfordshire than to get this railway line re-opened and used.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, I should like to say something about rail safety and the west coast main line modernisation. There has of course been much talk about how Railtrack will steadily improve its financial performance and build up its profits. There has also been much talk about cost cutting and the potential for cost cutting, which has inevitably led to fears about safety. Those fears must be allayed. In the chapter on work force safety, on page 10, the "Railway Group Safety Plan 1996-97", which was published by Railtrack, states:

"Organisations new to the railway also work at the trackside and the management of the arrangements to manage such contracts will be key to sustaining the improvement in trackside safety that has been achieved."

That sentence is self-explanatory, because it refers to new companies in the railway business that will get new contracts to improve and modernise the track. As the companies are obviously very new to the business—otherwise the document would not mention that they are—it is vital that the Health and Safety Executive becomes involved with them at a very early stage to ensure that safety rules are drawn up, which are new to those companies because they have never engaged on railway work before.

A second, equally important paragraph on page 10 refers to work force safety. It states that "organisations should develop their objectives aimed at reducing that risk to as low as reasonably practicable" and refers to other groups of workers who are exposed to risk.

Those organisations obviously must define what the other risks are, but they must also do something more. They must build up a joint management-work force committee that can identify and minimise the risks to safety to the lowest level that is practicably possible.

We all want to benefit from a new system of awarding contracts for railway work and to see new companies getting railway business and, hopefully, taking on more people, but the philosophy must always be value for money plus safety—the two simply must not be separated.

As a Member of Parliament representing a constituency in the south-east of the country, I should like to see the earliest possible start on the Bedfordshire-Euston section of the west coast main line, not only for the benefit of current users but for the benefit of future users who want to get to work in London or to stations down the line.

I have one comment to make on the document produced by Railtrack on the west coast main line modernisation. There is a section on page 33 of the document entitled "The Core Investment Programme". In relation to the new signalling arrangements, which is the subject of the section, the document states:

"Staff from each of the control disciplines would be co-located to reduce costs and optimise flexibility in the event of an incident, allowing the possibility of multi-skilling in the future."

That statement must raise some anxiety among the work force because the statement is—understandably because of new technology—hinting at the possibility of job losses in that part of the industry.

As we know, Railtrack had an extremely unhappy beginning because of the dispute with the signalmen. A wider point to be made in relation to technology is that some, though not all, privatisations have created real public disquiet and ill-will because of insensitive remuneration packages for directors and senior staff. The management of Railtrack must take the work force with it and work with the grain if it is successfully to make changes in the industry for the good of everyone.

I have always felt that one of the reasons why the possibility of privatising the Post Office was stalled was that the management simply could not get across to the work force the benefits of privatisation. Railtrack is about to float. It is incumbent on Railtrack management and of vital importance that it really does get across to the work force the benefits of privatisation.

Complicated and difficult though this privatisation has been, it can succeed because investment is at last freed from unnecessary, fiddling Treasury control. At last, we can get an increased volume of investment, which can transform the industry.

Years ago, Rab Butler used to stress to Conservatives the need to practise the patience of politics. We are going to need plenty of patience before the fruits of privatisation become apparent, but become apparent they will.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): Reflecting on the opening contributions to today's debate, it would be easy to regard the debate as an adversarial contest between a dying Government clinging desperately to their dogma and an Opposition bursting with condemnation but somewhat short on conviction. However, the debate goes far deeper than that and that first impression was surely false.

This debate goes to the very heart of whether Britain is to have an efficient modern transport system to boost our economy into the next century or whether we shall be left with the bare bones of a transport network, fought over by private interests motivated only by their personal and corporate profit.

The future of Railtrack and rail privatisation is vital to our economy and the environment. Incidentally, so far very little has been said about the environment, but I hope that other hon. Members will say something about an element that is so important to our transport system. Strategic investment and the decisions that go with it cannot be made in isolation. We have to consider the whole transport system—rail and road—as one. The various elements cannot be separated from each other when making strategic investment decisions.

If Railtrack is to become a linchpin in a revitalised transport system, we should be considering a series of key objectives and assessing how privatisation would or would not meet them. We need to create an investment culture to modernise, develop and expand the railways within an integrated transport system. Passenger and freight—especially freight—patronage has to be greatly increased to take up the spare capacity on the railways, which is running at about 50 per cent.

The railways need new customers, attracted by fast, efficient, frequent and, above all, cheap services. We need a modern and efficient rail system that delivers good value for money to the taxpayer. Above all, customers for the new modern railway must be able to use the system in the certain knowledge that it is maintained and operated to the highest safety standards. I believe that we have to set the proposals for the privatisation of Railtrack in the context of achieving those aims and examine the impact of privatisation so far. Perhaps we can forecast what is likely to happen with the privatisation of Railtrack.

Franchise after franchise has been let with no requirement for a commitment to invest in desperately needed rolling stock. There are one or two exceptions, which the Minister cited, but the vast majority of franchises have been let with little or no requirement to invest in rolling stock. Rail privatisation seems to have been driven by a sort of manic belief that competition and market forces are the ultimate goal if one is trying to provide an efficient railway system, yet a combination of the Government's desperate need to raise cash as quickly as possible and the Treasury's insistence that franchises should be limited to the minimum period that the Government can get away with has stifled investment in our railway system and, in fact, lost the very benefits that could have been gained from a partnership between the private and public sectors.

I shall cite one example. Last week, it was announced that the Network SouthCentral franchise has been let. As many hon. Members know, that part of the system has some of the oldest rolling stock in the country still trundling around. That rolling stock still has some of the notoriously dangerous slam doors, which have been the subject of so much condemnation by the Health and Safety Executive.

The franchise winners are not committed to invest a penny in new rolling stock. That is hardly surprising, because their franchise runs for only seven years. How can they be expected to invest substantially in new rolling stock, which has a life of at least 30 years, when, after seven years, they could lose out and see their investment disappear?

To date, the major impact of rail privatisation seems to have been to squeeze the life out of the rail industry. Not one new rail locomotive has been ordered in the United Kingdom for more than 900 days. The UK rail industry is on its knees and in danger of going into terminal decline.

Franchises should be renegotiated and not just allowed to run out, as the Opposition believe. I know that many rail franchise winners are eager to renegotiate and may already be talking to the Secretary of State about the possibilities that would provide the opportunity to invest in new rolling stock and improve rail services. One of the first jobs of a new Government should be to reconsider the franchises to update, renegotiate and widen them and make them attractive to the investor and the user.

Figures on investment in Railtrack are bandied about in all directions and plucked out of various pockets of air, but they rarely add up. The Rail Regulator's report to the Select Committee on Transport stated that, in 1994-95, Railtrack spent £150 million less than the average £483 million required in its asset management plan to maintain the rail network. That is probably an accurate statement. In its 10-year plan, Railtrack proposed investing less than Britain Rail had planned. Railtrack proposed £1.03 billion a year compared with British Rail's £1.11 billion a year. That seems to make sense to me. Of course—

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts) rose—

Mr. Chidgey: I thought that that might drag the Minister to his feet.

Mr. Watts: The hon. Gentleman is citing past figures for investment by British Rail, but will he acknowledge that he is talking about investment in infrastructure and rolling stock? In previous years, there was heavy investment—£4 billion over 10 years—for 4,000 new pieces of rolling stock. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman is not comparing like with like, even if the total figures that he is citing are correct.

Mr. Chidgey: I thank the Minister for that comment and I shall return to it later when comparing the subsidy paid by the taxpayer to British Rail in the past with the subsidy that the taxpayer is now expected to contribute under the privatised system. Perhaps the figures taken together will give us a greater insight into the overall cost of our railways.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Do the figures that the hon. Gentleman gave for British Rail's investment in infrastructure and rolling stock include the cost of works associated with the channel tunnel and the upgrading of the line to the tunnel?

Mr. Chidgey: The figures that I am using are those for maintenance and do not include investment in the channel tunnel rail link.

Setting aside the lack of investment, what hope is there that a privatised Railtrack will increase patronage? What steps will be taken under the new system to attract more passengers, and especially more freight, on to the railways which, as I said, are running at only 50 per cent. capacity? With the Rail Regulator's guidelines set firmly to maximise competition, there seem to be very few incentives to increase patronage. In fact, Railtrack seems perversely to be bent on driving away custom.

Railtrack's charges are so high that train operators are now moving rail vehicles and even locomotive fuel by road because it is cheaper to do so. The marginal costs of adding one extra coach to a train are £170,000, as I think the shadow Secretary of State for Transport said. The operator could provide a fleet of buses to move passengers around the country for less than that.

Railtrack's approach to attracting freight customers beggars belief: it is widely reported that Railtrack is erecting barriers to companies that would prefer to switch to rail. Developers hoping to build rail terminals and sidings accuse Railtrack of exploiting its monopoly and demanding excess sums for links with the rail network. Complaints are rife that Railtrack demands fat consultancy fees up front to carry out freight link feasibility studies instead of sharing the initial risk and recouping its fees if the project is successful; that is the standard way of operating in business and in every other sector of industry of which I am aware.

I emphasise my point by referring to an article that appeared in the Financial Times on 14 February this year. Railtrack was accused of demanding excess wayleave payments from developers who needed to build roads and bridges over railway land, even though it was not involved in those projects. A classic case is the £380 million freight terminal that PowerGen is building at Hams Hall near Birmingham. Before allowing PowerGen to build a road bridge over the track, Railtrack demanded a half share in the full profit from the £380 million development in which it was not involved and had not invested. That is the ransom that it demanded for granting wayleave over its land.

Instead of nurturing a culture aimed at creating and increasing business, developers are faced with monopolistic exploitation that will only worsen under the current privatisation programme. What hope can we have that a privatised Railtrack will provide a modern, efficient rail system that delivers good value for money to the taxpayer? I think that there is little hope of that.

I return to expenditure on the railways. I examined the Government's transport report while preparing my speech, and compared the figures in that report with those provided by people with knowledge of British Rail's performance. I found that, according to British Rail's figures, the taxpayer provided some £930 million in 1993-94 to support passenger services and £105 million to support passenger transport executives—a total of about £1 billion.

In 1994-95, under the Government's new regime, the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising—Opraf—support grants had risen to £1.74 billion, together with PTE support of another £340 million. Public support for the railways rose to £2 billion. Government expenditure plans show that, by 1995-96, Opraf will provide a support grant of £1.7 billion to which must be added the PTE support—that figure has not been produced, but one could reasonably expect it to be about £300 million. Therefore, public support for the railways would again be around £2 billion. It is likely to be the same in 1996-97. As a result of privatisation policy, the taxpayer's support for railways has doubled to £2 billion since 1994-95 and will continue to increase at a rate of £1.5 billion a year into the next century.

While the new rail companies remained in public hands, there was no great impact on public expenditure because the profits earned by the train operating companies, the ROSCOs—the rolling stock companies—and Railtrack were recycled to the Treasury. However, as the railway is fragmented and sold, the profits—paid for with taxpayer subsidies—will go not into vital investment in the railways but into the pockets of directors and shareholders, with a minimal commitment to expanding services and increasing passenger numbers and freight.

So we come to the flotation of Railtrack: the ultimate giveaway of public property, garnished with profits rightfully due to the taxpayer. We are told that Railtrack shares are likely to fetch some £1.5 billion on the stock market. Yet the net book value—never mind the replacement cost—is calculated in the prospectus at some £4.3 billion.

It is enlightening to see how financial advisers are marketing the share sales. I am pleased that the Minister is still in the Chamber, as he may not have had the opportunity to receive this sort of feedback. I refer him to one so-called "share shop" and its pamphlet which one can buy for an annual subscription of £40—I hasten to add that I did not buy it; it was given to me as an example. It is interesting to see how it is marketing the Railtrack shares. The pamphlet states:

"Railtrack is essentially a property company and the land that Railtrack will own could be regarded as one of the most valuable pieces of real estate in the United Kingdom".

It goes on to describe how the track passes through "valuable commercial and industrial sites all over the UK".

It refers to those as being ripe for exploitation—they are not my words, but those of the salesmen—with retail developments at main line stations competing with major department stores up and down the country. The pamphlet then describes how stations can have "a captive audience of passengers who are all potential customers".

It refers to the passengers who either arrive too early and have time to spare or, better still, who

"arrive at the last minute, missing their train, and have possibly an hour or so to wait until their next train.

This waiting time is valuable selling time for retailers and food providers".

So now we know: the aim is not to run a fast, frequent and efficient railway; it is to capture passengers at railway stations that have been redeveloped into shopping centres. That is the hidden agenda. It is no wonder the article is entitled "Railtrack—could this be the end of the privatisation gravy train?".

It may be good business for Railtrack to act as a property developer, but it is emphatically poor value for taxpayers, who have the right to expect that the billions of pounds that they pay in subsidy will be invested in a modern, busy railway. Taxpayers have the right to use a railway system that is maintained and operated to the highest safety standards. Under Railtrack, there has been a catalogue of failures to maintain safety standards which experts forecast will only worsen if it is privatised.

Mr. Tredinnick rose—

Mr. Chidgey: I am about to conclude. The hon. Gentleman will have a chance to speak later in the debate.

The Health and Safety Executive report on Railtrack's formal management systems concluded that the weaknesses in those systems could eat away at safety margins and increase the risk of harm.

Mr. Tredinnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chidgey: Madam Deputy Speaker, I will not give way; I shall finish my speech. I am sure that, in time, the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to contribute.

Mr. Tredinnick: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance. In a debate in which all hon. Members have given way generously, is it not a breach of normal behaviour in the House for the hon.

Gentleman to refuse to give way, despite the facts that there are no restrictions on the debate and he has ample time in which to do so?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): The rule is very clear and I expected the hon. Member for Bosworth to know it: it is entirely at the discretion of the hon. Member who has the Floor to decide whether to give way.

Mr. Chidgey: It is clear that overall responsibility for safety has become confused and that a culture of blame is developing. When something goes wrong, it is a case of, "It's not my fault, it is someone else's." A classic example was the recent Stafford rail crash. Railtrack's immediate response was to claim that the accident had nothing to do with it. In its haste, it wrongly advised one family that a relative had been killed.

I recently questioned the Minister about a derailment at Euston station last December which paralysed a major part of the network. It has emerged that Railtrack ignored three earlier warnings from its contractors about the condition of the track. Under the old British Rail regime—that old monument, as we were told earlier—the manager responsible for such dereliction would have been sacked on the spot. Railtrack did nothing, and the Minister has yet to tell me why. Is it any wonder that more than 80 per cent. of Railtrack's middle managers are opposed to the sale of Railtrack, stating as one of their major reasons the fact that safety standards are declining as commercial pressures start to drive the business?

In terms of investment, attracting new customers with fast, efficient and frequent services, providing modern, efficient rail systems delivering good value for money and providing a well-maintained and, above all, safe railway, Railtrack is failing, and it will fail faster under privatisation.

If we are to combat the growing congestion on our roads and the increasing pollution of our environment, we have to transport more people and freight by rail. The railways have a great unused capacity. Investment must be a priority to allow faster, more frequent and more convenient rail travel. The choice between investing in major new roads and investing in railways is vital to our economy and our environment. It is not acceptable to allow a private company to take such decisions solely in the interests of its shareholders.

The Liberal Democrats are prepared to pledge that, in the next Government, we would issue fresh guidelines to the Rail Regulator. He would no longer be required to promote competition; instead, he would be obliged to set ambitious targets for maximising patronage, to cap the dividends of Railtrack and to prevent it from exploiting its property assets at the expense of the taxpayer. Development profits would be used to invest in the railway rather than to benefit the shareholders and Railtrack would be forced to use its asset base as a financial instrument to raise capital to reinvest in the railway. Perhaps most significantly in terms of the operation of the railway, the Rail Regulator would have guidelines that forced Railtrack to charge freight operators only the marginal wear-and-tear costs of access to make sure that we brought freight back to the railways.

Our vision offers simplicity—fewer lawyers, fewer accountants, more passengers and less pollution—a busy, expanding railway giving value for money to the taxpayer.

5.40 pm

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): The public are fed up with the old arguments about privatisation. They deserve a more intelligent debate in which it is not always claimed that every conceivable human activity must be run in the private sector. At the same time, however, the Labour party must learn that it need not inevitably resist it to the death, as it invariably has done and is doing today.

I start from the position that commercial activities are better run by free enterprise than by Ministers and civil servants. That is unarguable, but even after 17 years and many benefits arising from previous privatisations, the Government cannot assume that the public will always see an overwhelming case for the private sector to run such activities. In each instance, the case must be made on its merits and I believe that in this case the merits are very great indeed.

What makes privatisation successful? What makes it work more effectively? In a word, it is competition. That is why the Government have sought to introduce genuine competition where it does not exist or exists only to a limited extent. Where competition is absent or very limited, it is necessary to substitute a strict regulatory regime. However, regulation has its limits. The more successful a company becomes at running its business, the more a regulator may find it necessary to intervene. Thus, the share price of a private enterprise may be affected more by investors' perception of a regulator's determination to exercise his powers than by almost any other factor.

Rail is a natural candidate for privatisation because it offers considerable opportunities for competition. The method of rail privatisation adopted by the Government certainly involves greater risks—especially political risks—than a straightforward single privatisation of the industry, but it also offers much greater opportunities for the future.

The franchise method means that many potential operators are competing for the right to run services over a period of years. If they are successful, they will operate a commercial enterprise with considerable potential to compete effectively with other domestic modes of travel, particularly road and air. As competition will exist when the franchises are awarded and then throughout the term of each franchise, I believe that it will not be necessary for the Rail Regulator to exercise his responsibilities with a heavy hand. That is why the operation of rail services falls naturally into the private sector. We still have to prove that case. Far from having difficulty in doing so, I welcome any opportunity to argue from that position.

Whatever criticisms may have been made of British Rail in the past, the fault lay mainly with the system under which it operated. Rigorous control of the railways by the Treasury has produced disastrous results for British Rail over many years. The franchising director, Roger Salmon, has explained that whereas capital expenditure often demands 30 and 40-year time horizons, the British Railways Board could often look forward only a few months. Capital expenditure had to be controlled until quite late in the year in case revenue fell short of what had been anticipated. If capital expenditure is managed in such a way, it becomes impossible to plan effectively and sensibly. I maintain that, ultimately, the success of privatisation can be properly assessed only by rail customers, and in those terms some of the benefits that ensue from the ability to plan on a longer-term basis are already apparent. I refer in particular to the guarantees that have been given about rail fares over the next seven years and about service levels, both of which are entirely new concepts. In relation to those factors, to access charges and to extending competition, the franchising director and the Rail Regulator can use their powers to benefit passengers in a way that Ministers never could or would.

The variety of train operating companies inevitably means that there will be variations in management style and practice. To some extent that will reflect the differences between the businesses that they run, but I believe that there will be opportunities to emulate best practice in a way that could not be secured in a monolithic structure.

Train operating companies will be able to plan ahead in a way that rail managers never could because of the confidence that there will be a steady flow of investment by Railtrack in renewal, maintenance and new capital investment. Those in British Rail who ran the trains could never be confident that their colleagues who provided the tracks on which the trains ran would be able to deliver. It was not that they did not want to do so, but it was possible that they might not.

The need to plan spending on an annual basis in the public sector meant that projects were subject to frequent interruptions. British Rail could not take advantage of supplier discounts and contractors had little incentive to invest in the most modern equipment. I understand that one project cost double the initial estimate because of frequent interruptions to work when annual funds were exhausted.

The only appropriate way to measure the success of rail privatisation is via customer satisfaction, but in time I am sure that there will be a repetition of the benefits to the taxpayer and the customer which have characterised previous privatisations.

In 1979, the borrowings and losses of state-owned industries were costed at some £3 billion a year. A decade later, newly privatised enterprises were making a contribution in terms of tax paid to the Treasury of some £2 billion. To anyone who claimed that we were selling off the family silver, I would respond that it was a strange analogy to use if having it on our shelves cost us good money whereas its use by others produced a handsome return.

Mr. Tredinnick: My hon. Friend will recall that the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), who spoke on behalf of the Liberal Democrats and who is not in his place at the moment, argued against the utilisation of land at stations and against the improvement of facilities. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is better to use those assets effectively and that it is in the public interest to do so, although it is obviously against Liberal policy?

Mr. Waller: I entirely agree. There has been a desire in the city of Bradford for many years to provide a shopping centre at Forster square station. I believe that that would be easier to do in future.

Mr. Wilson: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. In fairness to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), I want to point out that he left the Chamber only to give his speaking notes to Hansard. That was an extremely cheap point by a rather expensive hon. Member.

Mr. Tredinnick: I said that the hon. Member for Eastleigh was not in his place, which was correct. I did not say that he had left the Chamber. He was sitting at the other end of the Bench.

Mr. Waller: I believe that it will be easier in future to provide a shopping mall of the sort to which I referred, which has taken so long to develop in Bradford. Far from regretting that land will be developed, I think that is to be welcomed. The assets in question have been underdeveloped in the past. British Rail often wanted to develop them but was unable to do so because of limitations on its activities. The hotels that British Rail used to own remained underdeveloped compared with hotels in the private sector until the time that they were sold, which preceded this privatisation exercise. The sale of those hotels has been good for their customers and for taxpayers, who previously had to bear the hotels' losses incurred but who subsequently saw some benefit.

State ownership limits an industry's ability to look elsewhere for loans and investment. When a state-owned enterprise borrows money, the Government underwrite the loans, which make them indistinguishable from all other forms of public sector borrowing. Demands of enterprises such as the railways have often been fairly low on the list of priorities. Any Government first have a responsibility to the economy as a whole. As there are times when the needs of individual state enterprises must inevitably take a back seat to macroeconomic requirements, politicians often have to curtail the ability of state enterprises to borrow. Railways, like other industries, have never been able to achieve their potential under state control.

A recent editorial in the Financial Times stated:

"If the railways were working well, there would be an argument for leaving them alone. As it is, even with some of the highest fares in Europe, they are under-invested; passengers are still too often made to feel as though they are an encumbrance to the running of the railway, rather than the reason for it. . . Privatisation has already raised investment levels and transformed management in other industries. . . If the Government gets it right, its plan presents the best prospect of providing Britain with the attractive and well-run railway it needs."

I note that The Guardian has also acknowledged the potential in privatisation and that one should not discount that potential, which Labour Members are again doing tonight.

Other countries are not immune to the imperatives that drive privatisation forward in this country. Britain's record of investment in a nationalised rail sector is often unfairly compared with that of Germany and France. If the comparison is related to investment per mile of route, Britain by no means does badly.

The true cost of state ownership is now more fully appreciated in other countries, especially as losses increase. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport referred to the losses already accrued in France. Suggestions that the French Government intended to make a significant cut in the scale of their subsidy to the railways as a possible prelude to privatisation were sufficient last autumn to drive mollycoddled rail workers to strike action. France is watching closely what happens in Britain, because France appreciates that it cannot ignore the advantages that we are now grasping. The German Government have adopted a 10-year programme to transfer a major part of the rail network to the private sector, and many other countries are following the logic of that process. We are in the forefront of the process, but we are far from alone—other countries are waiting to learn from our success. Everywhere, competition is seen as the way forward.

Railtrack has announced that in the 10 years after privatisation it will spend more than £1 billion a year on maintenance and renewal of the rail network. When the sale of Railtrack is complete, it will have access to new sources of finance, enabling it to proceed with major projects. In the last 10 years, rail fares have risen more than 22 per cent. above inflation. I do not think that the customer has had a good deal for the money that he or she has spent. In the new privatised railways, key commuter and leisure fares will be pegged to the rate of inflation for the next three years, and they will be frozen below inflation for four years thereafter. Through tickets and railcards will still be available. Many of the scare stories that have been bandied about are simply not true.

In the past three weeks, the InterCity East Coast franchise has been awarded to Great Northern Railways, a subsidiary of Sea Containers. Judging by the plans announced by GNR, that looks like a good deal for users of the east coast main line, including myself. The outcome must be judged by deeds, not words. It is certainly good news for the taxpayer that GNR plans to change InterCity East Coast to a business that no longer relies on public money. Passengers—certainly from the north of England—will primarily be concerned with assessing the service that they receive.

I welcome the commitment to an improved passengers charter and upgraded facilities—especially at stations, with particular emphasis on passenger security measures and improved access for disabled passengers. It should prove possible to improve existing scheduled travelling times on Sunday, bearing in mind that InterCity East Coast has regularly allowed at least an extra 20 minutes on scheduled arrival times to allow for possible delays, usually enabling the claim to be made that the train has arrived up to 20 minutes ahead of time.

I hope that Great Northern Railways, in considering new business opportunities, will talk to Railtrack about the possibility of operating at least one London-bound train a day from Skipton, because many people believe that there is considerable potential for additional patronage from stations in the Aire valley. It is a great advantage that the line is already electrified, but I understand that additional work must be done to accommodate InterCity rolling stock—such as lengthening platforms and upgrading overhead power lines. I am afraid that they are the wrong kind of wires.

Many of the trains operated on the Airedale line and all those running on the Wharfedale line in my constituency are supported by West Yorkshire passenger transport executive under section 20 agreements. I welcome the Government's intention, stated in their response to the Transport Select Committee's report on railway finances, to use the standard spending assessment mechanism to provide support for PTE-secured rail services, which will enable them to deliver sufficient funding to maintain existing services in future years. Bearing in mind that, 15 years ago, the Wharfedale line in particular was threatened with extinction, it is welcome that local rail travellers can now look forward to a much more encouraging future.

The future for regular users of the Airedale and Wharfedale ultimately depends on the acquisition of new trains. We need to make up for a grievously shortsighted approach by the Treasury which, following electrification of the track infrastructure, was unwilling to give guarantees to the banks that were putting up the finance for new trains to be leased, and which were deterred by a number of uncertainties at the time—including the future of passenger transport authorities. The acquisition of second-hand trains that previously operated on the London-Tilbury-Southend line was the best deal that could be done in the circumstances, but slam-door stock—which first came into use in the 1950s—is a hopelessly unsatisfactory alternative to the acquisition of new trains. It is inadequate in safety terms and it comes nowhere near the standards that we should rightly expect on behalf of disabled people. For instance, it is impossible to get wheelchairs into those trains. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), then the responsible Minister, did his best to tie up a deal, but unfortunately he was not successful.

Despite money being spent on refurbishing the old LTS trains, serious technical failures occurred last November—fortunately without injury to passengers. The need to take all the electric rolling stock out of use and for it to go back to ABB at Crewe has resulted in an inadequate service for rail users in recent weeks. That has been a severe setback because patronage had increased following electrification of the line.

The problems have given a new impetus to talks that had already begun to discover whether an order could be submitted to bring new trains to those lines by around 1998. Some of the uncertainties that prevented the deal from being concluded some time ago, including the question whether the PTEs had a future, have now been resolved. Other matters, such as the length of a franchise for the operation of trains on the lines, have yet to be determined. I believe that a 15-year franchise term would provide a better prospect of securing a satisfactory leasing arrangement. As in the past, the best possible deal could be done by tying the acquisition of new trains to others being ordered elsewhere so that the benefits arising from economies of scale can be grasped.

I hope that it may be possible for an order to be submitted this year, enabling the new trains to be delivered in 1998. Unfortunately, recent setbacks may have led to a loss of confidence by some passengers and everything possible needs to be done to reassure them. For commuters, students and shoppers travelling to Leeds and Bradford, the train should be a convenient, comfortable and environmentally friendly alternative to the car. We must do everything we can to make that so. I agree with the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), who referred to the importance of the environment. If we can encourage the use of trains, it can do nothing but good for the environment. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads is aware of my local situation and I hope that we can rely on his support in achieving our objectives.

Privatisation is designed to halt and reverse the decline in railway use. As has been pointed out already in the debate, £54 billion has been invested since 1948 but, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his speech, the share of journeys by rail has fallen from 17 per cent. in 1953 to just 5 per cent. now. That has been bad for everybody. Privatisation offers a great opportunity for change. We already have some encouraging signs that many individuals and enterprises in the private sector want an opportunity to show that they can do better. We owe it to rail passengers, to the environment, to the companies and to the future of this country, which depends greatly on a good transport infrastructure, to give privatisation every encouragement.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The Secretary of State attempted to convince the House—with a marked lack of success—that the Government's plans for the privatisation of our railways and the creation of Railtrack were already an unqualified success. That has not been the experience of my constituents, certainly from the beginning of this year. [Interruption.]

I seem to be causing some concern to the hon. Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink). If he would like me to give way, I would be happy so to do. He is checking in the list of Members' interests, and I have little doubt that he is about to accuse me of not declaring an interest as a Member sponsored by the rail drivers union, the Association of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen or ASLEF.

The situation has changed since the House has reconvened. I, in common with all my right hon. and hon. Friends, am no longer sponsored by trade unions. Such sponsorship as the trade union movement continues to devote and dedicate to the Labour party is via the constituency parties and not to individual Members of Parliament. I hope that I have set the hon. Gentleman's mind at rest. [Interruption.] I clearly have not, so I will give way.

Dr. Spink: I was not going to make any accusation about the hon. Lady. I am delighted that she has explained the situation, and I am delighted that she no longer speaks for that vested interest. Perhaps she will join Conservative Members in speaking for the public interest and the passengers.

Ms Jackson: Would that Conservative Members spoke sufficiently frequently for the vested interests of their constituents and the public. If Conservative Members spoke for those interests, I have little doubt that they would join us in the Lobby tonight and vote against the flotation of Railtrack.

The point that I was attempting to make leads directly from the contribution by the hon. Member for Castle Point. The privatisation of our railways and, indeed, the formation of Railtrack have not been in the interests of my constituents, especially those living in two roads in the Cricklewood area. Since the beginning of this year, necessary work—I have no doubt that the work is necessary—on the tracks that run alongside those roads has been causing problems.

I have received a letter from one of my constituents, on behalf of the Fordwych Residents' Association, which states:

"I write . . . to advise you of the very considerable discomfort, inconvenience and apprehension of danger to their homes and properties experienced by many of the residents in this area as a consequence of the very much increased vibration from the railway track which runs parallel" to those roads. He continues:

"people . . . have lived for many years adjacent to the railway line and have become inured and habituated to the normal level of traffic"—

but he says that they regarded the current level of vibration to be abnormal. That letter was dated 14 March.

A response to that letter, dated 1 April, came from the infrastructure services manager of Railtrack Midlands to my constituent. The reply states:

"Your fear that vibration from the railway may lead to long term structural damage to your house must be denied."

There is no reason why my constituent must deny the experience that he, his family and neighbours are living through at the moment, but the most important paragraph of the letter is the last one. The letter is signed by Mr. K. B. Humphrey and states:

"The above may not be what you want to hear but I am afraid Railtrack do operate their railway with the benefit of statutory authority and in the absence of proof of negligence they are not liable to adjoining landowners for noise, vibration or otherwise."

Many Conservative Members, in our debates on the channel tunnel rail link, have voiced the concerns of their constituents about the possible vibration and noise that may be contingent upon the construction of that high-speed line. The letter is a fairly clear proof that Railtrack is not putting the customer first. We are told that that is the basic overriding priority of any privatised company—the Secretary of State said it today. The phrase he used was that the customer is king. Clearly Railtrack does not regard its customers as king.

For me, there is another cause for concern in the exchange of correspondence on that issue, and I am sure that all hon. Members would share that concern. There has been much correspondence between myself and my constituents, and between Railtrack and myself on behalf of my constituents, since the beginning of this year. On 12 April, I received a letter from Railtrack East Anglia, from Miss Sandra Jones, the public affairs manager. Her letter states:

"The line in question is in Railtrack's Midland zone. I have forwarded your letter for them to deal with. To speed up these matters in the future"—

clearly Railtrack believes that such difficulties will not abate—

"would you be pleased to mark on a map which railway lines in your constituency are ours and which belong to other Railtrack zones?"

I find it bewildering that Railtrack does not know what it is supposed to be in charge of—it seems not to know which are its lines, where they are and what responsibilities it has.

We have heard about the overall benefits that must inevitably arise for the travelling public from the Government's privatisation plans. The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) talked about closed circuit television, which has been a proven success in reducing crime, whenever the Government have managed to find the funding to assist local authorities, for example, to install it. The automatic presumption, indeed assumption, that privatisation will bring about many necessary benefits—over the past 17 years, successive Conservative Governments have markedly failed to consider them—is not realistic.

I visited Edmonton Green earlier this week. There, the local Labour-controlled authority, Enfield council, had been in consultation with the West Anglia and Great Northern railway to install closed circuit televisions in the four stations in the area. I should say that in one of the stations, Bushill Park, CCTV has already been installed. There were three other stations, however, where the Labour-controlled local authority and the railway company were wishing to install CCTV. These were Edmonton Green, Silver Street and Angel Road.

Only on Tuesday of this week, I believe, the West Anglia and Great Northern railway had to put the scheme on hold, due to uncertainty about its future after privatisation.

Dr. Ian Twinn (Edmonton): It was kind of the hon. Lady to announce that she had been to my constituency, although she did not have the grace to say beforehand that she was going to do so. I am glad that she has acknowledged that it was Tory action that led to the installation of television at Bushill Park station.

Do not the hon. Lady's remarks confirm that we need to ensure that British Rail is in the private sector, so that there is freedom to invest and so that uncertainty can be removed? The hon. Lady is suggesting that there will be further Treasury cuts and stop-starts in providing funding for BR under her scheme, which means that my constituents would be even more disadvantaged if she were ever to be in power.

Ms Jackson: I cannot think of a greater disadvantage for any constituent in any part of the country than to be represented by a Conservative Member. If they have failed consistently for 17 years to bring basic improvements into the railway system, such as safety—[Interruption.] Conservative Members have voted consistently for reductions in services generally.

In the railway industry, over the past 33 months during which the Government have been introducing privatisation, there have been job losses for 24,872 people, at a cost to the taxpayer—to Conservative Members' taxpayers—of about £500,000 a day in redundancy payments. Yet Conservative Members have the audacity and the temerity to attempt to convince the House and the country generally that the Government's policy of privatising the railways has brought benefits to the taxpayer.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who speaks from the Opposition Front Bench on transport matters, had occasion to say this afternoon, the actual costs to the taxpayer of the Government's attempt to privatise the railways, and the flotation of Railtrack, is approaching £2.6 billion. Not one penny piece of that sum has gone into improving track and signalling. None of that sum has been used to install CCTV in the three remaining stations in the constituency of the hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn). Services have not been improved.

Constant and consistent unmanning seems to be the first step that every franchise operator takes. When a franchise has been awarded, unmanning will do nothing to attract people on to the railways. As the hon. Member for Keighley said, it is virtually impossible for people with disabilities to use our railways, as they would undoubtedly wish to do, if stations are unmanned. It is equally highly unlikely that women will consider travelling late at night on our railways if stations are unmanned and the only other person on the train is probably the driver. The dangers are too well reported for that to be a possibility.

Will the Government's policy attract people from their cars on to the railways? My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood stressed how grossly unbalanced is the present structure for those freight operators who would like to move freight from the roads on to the railways. There is nothing in the Government's privatisation plans or in the flotation of Railtrack that will balance the current basic inequity. Yet we must acknowledge that the way forward, both economically and environmentally, is to attract greater passenger use of our railway system, and certainly greater freight movements by rail.

Privatisation and the flotation of Railtrack, far from expanding the use of railways and improving the presently integrated system, will lead to the break-up of the system. It is nonsense for the Government to argue that the £2.6 billion that the taxpayer has already spent on a benighted policy will improve investment in our railways.

Railtrack has announced, I understand, after the publication of its prospectus, that it perceives spending £10 billion over the next 10 years as investment in our railway infrastructure. I believe that it was three years ago that Mr. Horton trumpeted with some pride that Railtrack intended to spend £800 million over the next 10 years on the west coast main line alone. That £8 billion would, over the 10 years to which he referred, have brought the west coast main line to the level at which it stood in 1973. That amount of investment would have produced a west coast main line that was 30 years out of date.

Apparently the magic door that will open to the treasuries of the world after Railtrack is privatised will produce for the entire network—not one line—only £10 billion over the next 10 years. There are already massive lengths of track along which trains must run slowly. There are speed restrictions because the lines have not been maintained to enable trains to run at the speeds of which they are capable.

We have heard much about the possibility of new rolling stock. If memory serves me correctly, Network SouthCentral, the most recent franchised line, stated categorically that it had no plans to provide new rolling stock on its lines. Network SouthCentral has 60 per cent. of the old slam-door trains. At the end of three years, the majority of its rolling stock will be 50 years out of date.

Network SouthCentral acknowledges that, over the next three years, it intends to invest £10 million in the line. That is £3.3 million a year. That is entirely inadequate, as anyone who knows anything about railways would agree.

There is no possibility, as we have seen ever since the Government introduced privatisation, that their proposals will create a railway fit for the 21st century and fit for the people. The only privatisation that our railway needs after 17 years of less than benign neglect by successive Conservative Governments is, as the Labour party has consistently argued, a public-private partnership. That is not, as the Government clearly wish, to wash our hands of the whole affair and push the railway system into the private sector.

[Ms Jackson]

I believe that it was the Secretary of State who said this afternoon, in attempting to rubbish—with no success whatever—my hon. Friend's commitment that the Rail Regulator would have infinitely more powers, that he had read in The Independent that the Labour party had argued for dispensing with the regulator in the gas industry. I do not remember the newspaper in which it appeared, but there was a report that the Government intended to abolish the Department of Transport, so one either believes what the newspapers say or one does not, and the Secretary of State was somewhat selective.

By their marked failure to create a properly integrated public transport system for this country, with the railways as the central pillar of a properly integrated public transport system, the Government have done nothing but unmitigated damage. Morale of those dedicated people who have worked all their lives in the railway industry, and who would wish to see out the rest of their working lives in the railway industry, has never been lower.

If Conservative Members really are concerned with the vested interests of their constituents, they should know that the electorate and the nation as a whole have consistently argued against rail privatisation. Every opinion poll has shown that more than 69 per cent. of people in this country are totally opposed to it, and I have little doubt that they are totally opposed to the flotation of Railtrack, particularly when it is their money that is being given as sweeteners to people who will take it out of the railway system and put it into private pockets.

I strongly urge Conservative Members to consider voting with Labour Members tonight. Perhaps they will do so out of self-interest, because one of the most recent opinion polls on the privatisation of the railways highlighted the fact that one in five people who voted for a Conservative Member of Parliament at the previous election stated categorically that they would seriously reconsider that decision on the single issue of rail privatisation.

As the South-East Staffordshire by-election showed only last Thursday, there is virtually no issue that the people of this country believe a Conservative Government could do anything to improve, and in the main they regard the problems of this country, quite rightly, as the exclusive prerogative of an incompetent and, as they say, arrogant and uncaring Government.

Here is an opportunity for Conservative Members to refute that argument, although that it is virtually impossible now, by arguing for once for the interests of the nation and their constituents by voting against the privatisation of Railtrack.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): The key issue before us is whether it is better to take the rail system forward in privatised hands or whether it should remain nationalised. After 50 years of nationalisation, we have seen a lack of investment, a reduction in safety standards and no way forward.

I challenged the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), the shadow Secretary of State for Transport, to say how she should increase passenger movements and the carriage of freight. She was unable to say, other than by investment. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State challenged her on where that investment would come from. The answer was that it would have to come from taxpayers, and that it would cost an enormous amount, increasing taxation, borrowing, interest rates, inflation—the old socialist dogma, which, as we have seen, has failed over so many decades.

We have this evening a chance to break out and ensure that the management of Railtrack continues to provide a much better system, investing where people want them to invest and improving the infrastructure. I was surprised by the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey)—a civil engineer like me—who seemed to be opposed to the investment in stations and land. Surely that is where Railtrack's assets will increase enormously, to the benefit of shareholders who will buy into Railtrack in the coming months.

We want better facilities at our stations. We want the travelling public to be better catered for. We want facilities that are more in line with our European competitors, because having served on the Select Committee that considered the channel tunnel rail link, I know only too well that the high-speed rail system on the French side is much better than any system that exists over here, unless Railtrack is privatised and improves facilities throughout the country.

The Opposition motion calls for "higher levels of rail investment, improved services and the best possible return on taxpayers' money."

We shall get that through privatisation. Railtrack's plans have already been announced. It will spend billions of pounds over the next 10 years, and will have to show that to its shareholders in terms of improvements to the whole rail infrastructure. The improved services will come from the rail operating companies. I am delighted that franchises have already been awarded for quite a large percentage of the rail system, and that percentage will improve and become more than 50 per cent. in the not too distant future.

The best possible return on taxpayers' money will be achieved by privatisation, and the taxpayer will benefit by almost £2 billion. Instead of writing off enormous sums by way of large subsidies, subsidies will be dramatically reduced in the coming years. Added to that, corporation tax will be paid, as it has been in every other privatisation in the past 17 years. Huge corporation tax income will flow to the Government. Indeed, the Government's amendment talks about "the prospects of better services and higher investment at less cost to tax-payers."

We need private finance for that investment.

I shall briefly instance some of the disadvantages that we have seen in my constituency from the rail system being in nationalised hands. Parbold station—a village station—on the way from Southport, which is on the coast, to Manchester, has never had access for the disabled. We were promised disabled access before the 1992 general election, and that we would have it within two months. It took three years of my chasing—often weekly and monthly—to ensure that we had disabled access.

I am certain that, under the privatised regime, disabled access will be a right at all our stations. Chorley station, which I opened some 10 years ago, has never had a telephone or a toilet. Surely, in privatised hands, we would see better facilities.

I liken the plans for privatisation between Railtrack and the operating companies to our proposals for health, which have been carried through to fruition, where we have the purchaser-provider breakup. In this case, the purchaser, the operating companies, require from the provider, Railtrack, the right facilities: terminals, stations, rail track, signalling systems, and high levels of safety. They will be able to demand and obtain those from their franchises.

After privatisation, Railtrack will be completely free to make long-term investments, as was so ably pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller). At the moment, having to compete with education, health and the myriad Government priorities is impossible on such a short-term basis. We want long-term investment, in the interests of shareholders and taxpayers. We will see that in the private enterprise.

I am delighted to support the Government's amendment. I look forward to this country having a first-class rail system with more investment. I have total confidence in Bob Horton and his team. The idiotic criticism by the shadow Secretary of State for Transport was totally uncalled for. Bob Horton has proved over the years in the private sector that he knows how to run a show in the interests of shareholders.

I look forward to ensuring that there are fewer subsidies over the years, and a return to the investors in the shares. I look forward to buying some of those shares myself, and I would strongly recommend that to any hon. Member or any member of the public listening to the debate this evening. That is the way forward.

According to the opinion polls, most people think that the rail system will become less safe and reliable, and that there will be fewer services. We hear the same criticisms of every privatisation, but every privatisation has been a success, and I look forward to the resounding success of rail privatisation in the capable hands of Bob Horton and Railtrack.

6.29 pm

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am pleased to be able to speak in the debate. It follows the publication of the pathfinder prospectus earlier this week, which was a further step in the privatisation of Railtrack.

The Secretary of State did not say much about the Government amendment, and, having read it several times, I am not surprised. Let me draw attention to one little word in it—"prospects". The amendment refers to "offering the prospects of better services and higher investment at less cost to tax-payers".

I believe that the word "prospects" suggests a lack of certainty, even on the Government's part, that privatisation will deliver what is claimed for it. I have "prospects" of winning the national lottery—I buy a ticket every week—but as yet I have failed to win more than £10. Nevertheless, I think that my chance of winning the lottery is higher than the Government's chance of winning the next general election.

I do not believe that the Government are very confident about their proposal. They know that the opinion polls show that the public are opposed to rail privatisation. I shall not refer again to figures that have been cited several times today, but the fact remains that the public continually demonstrate their opposition to the privatisation of the railways. Even more important, having been on the doorstep in South-East Staffordshire trying to get their people to vote for them in the recent by-election, the Conservatives must know that even the potential Conservative voters who remain are opposed to privatisation. They must also know that the majority of those who may have some sympathy with the proposal consider the method—the fragmentation—nonsensical. The general view is that we need an integrated, co-ordinated public transport system, and an integrated, co-ordinated rail system within that.

The one thing on which there has been broad agreement in the House is the need for investment in the railways. Everyone agrees that there has been a lack of investment—in varying proportions—over the past 50 years. Opposition Members believe that such investment should be made by a partnership: that public and private sectors should work together. We should not have the privatised nonsense that the Government propose; the public sector must play a major role.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) pointed out, it is not just a question of investment. If we want people to use the railway system, we must employ more people. A few months ago, I travelled by rail to Tooting, which is not so far from the House of Commons. Although the station is manned during the day, it is unstaffed in the evening. On both platforms, people who clearly had no intention of travelling were throwing bottles and stones from one platform to another. It was late in the evening, and I was returning to the House to vote. I waited anxiously for my train, feeling somewhat wary and cautious. If I had been an old-age pensioner or a woman, I would have been terrified and would not have gone near the station. That is one reason why people are not using the railways: they are often afraid to.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned access to trains and stations for the disabled. It needs to be improved. I accept that that cannot be done overnight—the cost would be astronomical—but passengers should be able to know where they can get on and off trains, and to expect assistance from staff whenever they choose to travel, not just until 6 pm or 7 pm. I do not think that the privatisation of Railtrack will provide the necessary investment.

In response to two interventions, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) said—quite fairly—that British Rail was not perfect. She also said, however, that it was better than what the Tory Government now proposed. Conservative Members should remember that their party has been in government for 30 of the 50 years in which British Rail has been in the public sector, and that in a couple of weeks they will have been continuously in government for 17 years. They have a good deal of responsibility for the faults in the system. Yes, British Rail is not perfect. The Government may have to accept that they have failed in their duty as the nation's shareholder, controlling it without improving the position.

I accept that there are faults in British Rail. I am currently pursuing two issues with Railtrack. They may sound very simple. One involves litter on the track throughout the country. The track opposite Sefton terrace in Burnley was cleared only when we had a royal visit a few years ago, and has not been cleared since: it is currently an appalling eyesore. Must we arrange another royal visit? Another eyesore is the track on the line to Padiham, where a power station has closed. The track has not been used for a couple of years.

Railtrack has responsibilities for such matters. I have not examined the Pathfinder prospectus, and I do not know what it says about Railtrack's responsibility for litter and fencing on the land that it owns following privatisation; but safety is currently Railtrack's responsibility, and it must clearly remain its responsibility following privatisation.

Why are the Government changing their policy? I accept that, when the Railways Bill was passed in 1993, it gave the Government the power to do what they are currently doing; no one suggested that they could not take such action. But did not the Government repeatedly say that Railtrack would be in the public sector for the foreseeable future? Did not the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the right hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman)—then a Transport Minister—say exactly those words during debate on the Railways Bill? What, at that time, was "the foreseeable future"? Was it only a couple of years, or was the Government's statement misleading? We are not allowed to accuse them of being deliberately misleading, but was what they said misleading? Has it been accepted that there has been a move to the right, and that the Government now believe that they must privatise something whose privatisation they formerly did not consider necessary?

Perhaps the Government need the cash for pre-election tax cuts. Perhaps that comment really hits the nail on the head. Perhaps they need the money. Perhaps they want to try to bribe the electorate. Would it not be a very expensive bribe to sell assets that are worth £6.5 billion for a potential income of £1.8 billion? It is outrageous if that is what the Government are going to do, because they are the custodians of the nation's assets.

We all remember Harold Macmillan accusing the Government of selling the nation's silver. With this privatisation, the Government are selling the nation's assets, and they are not going to get anywhere near the value for them that they should. They are failing the nation if they go ahead with the privatisation. If the £6.5 billion is not the true value of the assets, why are track access charges being based on a Railtrack value of £6.5 billion? The Government cannot have it both ways; one thing or the other must be wrong.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ladywood said that the annual taxpayers' subsidy to a privatised Railtrack would be £850 million more than it was prior to privatisation. The Secretary of State never responded to that. Is that correct or not? The Minister needs to clarify it. If it is correct, what will we get for that extra £850 million subsidy? Who will benefit from it—top management or shareholders?

The Secretary of State referred to employee shares and gave some detail on that proposal. We have seen it all before. Under the privatisation of PowerGen, National Power and others, special shares were provided for employees, but the employees did not get a director with those shares or any say in management. Although what happened with the Trustees Savings bank is slightly different because the Government did not get the proceeds of its privatisation, what happened to it is relevant. It also said that it would ensure employees' interests through rights to discounted shares and that small shareholders would be protected. Within a very short period, once the protection under the relevant Act had passed away, the very small number of shareholders at the top were able completely to outvote the mass of small shareholders. Towards the end of last year, the TSB was no longer an independent body. It is now part of the Lloyds group.

It is absolute nonsense to fragment the railways in the way that the Government are proposing. Some of my constituents have already had difficulties travelling. One travelled from Burnley to London and back, leaving Burnley Central station on the East Lancashire line, which is owned by one company, going on to the west coast main line at Preston for the InterCity part of the route, and returning by InterCity on the same part of the route. The journey ended not at the same railway station in Burnley, but at Burnley Manchester Road station on the Roses line, which was opened a few years ago and has been extremely successful. It must be said that the line was financed jointly by the National and Provincial building society, which is sadly disappearing into the Abbey National, and Lancashire county council, which supported it very much.

My constituent's journey involved three different railway companies, and there was a problem on each part of the journey as well as at Preston station. Four people will have to deal with the complaint in four different sections of the newly privatised, glorified system of nonsense that the Tory party will force on us if it does not draw back from the privatisation of Railtrack. What a way to run a railway system; what a way to run a country.

The prospectus confirms that nothing will be gained in the improvement of train services by privatising Railtrack. It says:

"Railtrack's passenger access income is unlikely to benefit materially from any increase in passenger use".

It also admits that increases in freight by rail are unlikely, stating:

"The opportunities for expanding rail freight operations are limited."

The previous Prime Minister, Lady Thatcher, once responded to an intervention by saying that it was a funny old world. It is a funny old prospectus that says that even if passenger use is increased, not much money will be made by it, and that the only dividends will be those that the public provide in subsidy. That is why it is such nonsense to create an initial profit to give to shareholders almost as soon as Railtrack is privatised. What a bribe to get people to buy shares. What a fiddle. I call it that because that is what the majority of people believe it to be. That is not the way to do things.

Debt has been written off from every privatised industry. If anybody else takes over a company, they have to take over any debt as well. Yet when the Government privatised water, the debt was written off, and a massive debt will be written off when Railtrack is privatised. Why should not the privatised company be liable to pay that debt back to the nation in years ahead? Orange was recently floated. It was a completely new flotation, so I am comparing one new flotation with another. It has made no profit to date, yet the Government would not give it any money to give to its shareholders or say that they would subsidise its first dividend for anyone who decided to respond to its prospectus.

Safety is important, and there are growing concerns about it on the railways partly as a result of the state of the infrastructure. Fifty sections of track on the west coast main line are now subject to speed restrictions as a result of the state of the track. There was none when the British Rail infrastructure was transferred to Railtrack. Already, within a couple of years, it has deteriorated.

The west coast main line is in need of investment—we all know that. I recognise the difficulties and, to be fair to the Minister, I know that he recognises the need for investment and is sympathetic to it. We all know that investment concerns not only signalling, track, overhead cabling or rolling stock. Those things must all be invested in to produce the type of rail service that we need on the line, which, with all respect to the east coast, carries much more traffic and is much more heavily used. Major investment is needed.

We recognise the difficulties, especially for parts of the track on which high-technology signalling and a low-technology system for local services that use some of the same parts of the track will be needed, such as the track feeding into Preston, and so on. There would be such difficulties, whoever owned Railtrack. What the Government are proposing offers no speedier solution to the need for improvements to the west coast main line. The Minister will disagree, but the Government have got it wrong. We need a publicly owned railway transport system.

We need a combination of private and public sector investment, to ensure that we can improve the track and rolling stock to give us the service that we need as we move towards the 21st century. I believe that the way in which the Government are moving is totally wrong, and that the Labour party is showing the right way ahead. If the Government do not heed us and change their mind, they will find that this one issue will add even more nails to their coffin when they finally have the courage to face the electorate.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has been extremely frank tonight—not least in his last few words. He said that he is in favour of a publicly owned rail service. He is at odds with the Government, but also with Opposition Front Benchers and we await the speech from the shadow Minister to see whether that gulf exists.

I begin by welcoming the announcement by the Secretary of State about the requirement placed upon the successful bidder for rail services in the south-east to make a clear and unequivocal commitment to replacing all of the 40-year-old rolling stock on one of the busiest rail routes in the country. That is something that Members of Parliament representing Kent constituencies—including myself—have made representations about for some time, and I am delighted that my right hon. Friend has met the concerns of commuters in the county of Kent.

Mr. Bayley: The hon. Gentleman will realise that I have a constituency interest in the matter. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—when he was a Transport Minister—said that the rolling stock would start to be delivered in 1995. Had the Government stuck to their commitment, the carriage works in York would still be in business. I agree that it is good that the rolling stock is coming, but it is a shame that, under public sector control, the Government blocked the provision of that rolling stock, leading to the closure of the carriage works in my constituency.

Mr. Dunn: If called, the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) can make his own speech later. All I say is that we have received an undertaking from the Secretary of State today that new rolling stock will be in place within three years. I will hold all concerned to that date, given that commitment by my right hon. Friend.

Hon. Members from both sides of the House have said what they want from the rail service. We all want a punctual and reliable service, and—from the consumers' point of view—we want as low cost a service as possible, but constant emphasis has been placed on the safety of the service. I resent the notion that in future under a privatised scheme there will be more examples of bad practice, dangerous accidents and damage to people and services. It is not beyond the recollection of many hon. Members—I do not want to make a political point on this—that there have been major disasters in the past, such as at Hither Green and Harrow and Wealdstone. We must be careful about making points about safety, as that can be deemed to be scaremongering. I am sure that Opposition Members would not wish to do that, and we must be careful about the extent to which we refer to safety.

Mr. Wilson: If postulated in that way, such claims can be deemed to be scaremongering. Does the hon. Gentleman not understand the distinction between saying that private operators are less likely to operate a safe regime—which is not the argument—and saying that a fragmented railway is inherently less safe than an integrated railway? If he needs further evidence of that, he should look at the Health and Safety Executive's report on rail privatisation, which said that a fragmented railway was likely to lead to more serious accidents than less. The report then made 38 serious recommendations to counteract that possibility. Is it responsible for a Government to put in place a railway that is inherently less safe than the one we have at present?

Mr. Dunn: The point that I was trying to make is that however much every hon. Member hopes for the minimum number of accidents, the fact is that—in its earlier nationalised state—there were accidents on the rail network. It is wrong to pretend that there was a golden age, and I hope that Opposition Members are not trying to pretend that there was.

Any debate on privatisation is bound to show clear blue water—the clear philosophical difference between the Conservatives and the Opposition. This debate on rail privatisation is no different from many of the debates that we have had in this House in the past 17 years, with—I am sorry to say—the same predictable estimates of gloom and doom, full-blown rhetoric, half-facts and scare stories from the Labour party. Why does Labour do it? It is fed partly by Labour's deep-rooted hostility to free enterprise and partly as a result of instructions from the vested interests—the trade unions that sponsor many Opposition Members.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) is not here, as I was going to refer to her statement that she is no longer sponsored by ASLEF and is therefore able to speak in any way that she likes. Her constituency party, however, is now sponsored by that union. The extent of that sponsorship is there for all to see. When she last registered her sponsorship, her constituency party received £5,500, and 80 per cent. of her election expenses were paid by the union.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us who contributes to his election expenses, what firms he is connected with and what speeches he has made in this Chamber that vaguely reflect some of his involvement in industry?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Lady knows that I am a great admirer of her—from afar. If she checks the Register of Members' Interests, she will see that I am sponsored by no one. I receive no sponsorship, and I have no outside interests. I speak entirely for the people who elected me—the people of Dartford. I understand her point, as clearly union sponsorship is a huge embarrassment to Labour. It is clear that any sponsored hon. Member is bought—not in the direct sense of money changing hands, but indirectly. Undue influence—or due influence—is brought to bear on individual Labour Members who have representatives from the unions that sponsor them sitting on their general management committees. If the hon. Member does not do what the union likes, he is called to account.

I was referring to scare stories, and I shall give two examples from the past. The House may recall the debates in the early 1980s on the privatisation of BT. During one such debate, the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) said:

"The public telephone box could be threatened with extinction."—[Official Report, 18 July 1983; Vol. 46, c. 41.]

The truth is that the number of BT call boxes has increased by more than 50 per cent. to 127,000, 96 per cent. of which work at any one time compared with 75 per cent. in 1987.

The second example concerns British Airways. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar)—who has just walked into the Chamber—said in a debate on the Civil Aviation Bill that British Airways

"will be the pantomime horse of capitalism if it is anything at all."—[Official Report, 19 November 1979; Vol. 974, c. 125.]

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): That was 16 years ago.

Mr. Dunn: It may have been 16 years ago, but the hon. Gentleman is as wrong now as he was then. British Airways is the world's favourite airline, and carries more international passengers than any other carrier—some 6 million more than its nearest competitor in 1993. We know what the Labour party wants. As the hon. Member for Burnley said—with the characteristic honesty and frankness that has made him famous throughout Burnley—Labour wants a state-controlled rail monopoly, run for and by the trade unions. We want a rail service that is modern and dynamic, run for and responsive to the needs of the British travelling public.

Opposition Members have referred to opinion polls. We can all quote opinion polls in aid of our argument. The Guardian of today's date contains two interesting articles. One is about the leaked letter from Mr. Welsby. The one underneath, which I would like to know more about, is headed "Short taxed again by Blair lecture". If that relates to the meeting between the shadow spokesman and the Leader of the Opposition, I really would like to know what commitment she had to give to him, but alas I am sure that we will never know what went on.

The first article refers to the leaked letter dated 2 April to Sir Patrick Brown from Mr. John Welsby. It outlined a number of concerns about the prospectus. The article says that a spokesman for the Department of Transport said:

"Sir Patrick has responded to Mr. Welsby and is satisfied that all his fears have been allayed."

The article goes on to refer to an ICM poll that was taken between 12 and 13 April last. It asked 1,200 adults aged 18 and over whether they thought that when British Rail was fully privatised services would be better or worse or they did not know. The result was that 33 per cent. believed that services would be better, 20 per cent. did not know—they were neutral—and 47 per cent. believed that services would be worse. My arithmetic is as good as anyone else's and I conclude that 53 per cent. were either neutral or thought services would be better and a minority—albeit a substantial one—of 47 per cent. thought that services would be worse.

The next question was whether those interviewed thought that when British Rail was fully privatised services would be safer, less safe or did not know. The result was that 34 per cent. thought that services would be safer, 24 per cent. did not know and therefore must have been neutral and 43 per cent.—still a significant minority, but fewer than in response to the previous question—believed that services would be less safe. It is interesting that the opinion poll commissioned by The Guardian—a paper not sympathetic to my point of view—gave that result.

Mr. Wilson: Read the next question.

Mr. Dunn: I have some difficulty with the next question because, unfortunately for The Guardian, not all the figures add up to 100 per cent. For the first question the figures add up to 100 per cent., for the second they add up to 101 per cent. and for the third—whether services would be cheaper, dearer or they did not know—they add up to 99 per cent.

Mr. Wilson: Give us the figures about fares.

Mr. Dunn: I must be in control of my own track on this matter rather than respond continually to the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson).

Opinion polls play a significant part in the thinking of the Labour party today. If Labour Members are motivated in their desires by an opinion poll of this sort, which they would say gave some credence to their ideas, what about the opinion polls in which 75 per cent. of those polled say that they believe that there should be a return to grammar schools? Why do they not take that into account? Labour Members are making highly selective use of opinion polls on this occasion. If they ignore opinion polls that call for the return of grammar schools and the restoration of capital punishment or come out against a federal state or a single currency—all the things that any hon. Member may care to adumbrate in a speech—why do they single out this example? Why do we have the Labour party wholly run by opinion polls on this issue? It makes out that it responds to every issue on which the public express an opinion.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: No. I am about to make an entirely new point.

Not too much mention has been made today about the fat cats. I thought that we would get a certain amount of that. I wonder why. It is interesting. I think there is a problem here. Fat cats in the former privatised industries are one thing, but what about the fat cats in the private sector per se? The Labour party complains about those who receive large salaries for having huge responsibilities. It does not complain about the chairman of ICI or the chairmen of the boards of J. Sainsbury or Marks and Spencer, but they complain about people who have huge responsibilities elsewhere. It is a fair point and they can make it as often as they like, but what about the fat cats who support the Labour party?

What about Maureen Lipman, Melvyn Bragg and Ken Follett, who earn hundreds of thousands of pounds a year? We have to be careful in our attitude to fat cats. The Labour luvvies, whom Labour Members love to adore, are the fat cats who pay for the champagne parties that they all go to.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Who elected their leader and pays for his expenses?

Mr. Dunn: I do not know about that. I am sure that my hon. Friend can make that point in a different way. It all comes down to the fact that the Labour party has not changed. It is still being run for the unions and by the unions; Labour Members' links to the unions are their Achilles' heel. Do not claim victory yet. There is a long way to go to the next general election. When people start to see the traditional links between the Labour party and the trade unions and the range of activities that will count against it, it may well be in deep trouble.

A little has been said today about the esteem of the workers. A newly privatised rail service would give those who work in the railway service a chance to be proud of the work that they do. Railway workers will not be the music hall joke of the past. They will not be the butt of the joke at the dinner party. They will be given a real chance to show that they can work with efficiency, pride and determination in a privatised system. I am sure that they will do that.

Labour opposes privatisation for the railways today, as it opposed every other privatisation. It believes in nationalisation, public control, levers of power and giving more powers to the regulator—about which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) made a thin point. I am not sure what all these levers are going to do and what these notions will bring about. Nationalisation is Labour's only policy and it has proved a failure. Therefore, I urge all my hon. Friends to support the Government's amendment tonight.

7.5 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): I must begin with an apology to you, Madam Speaker, and to the House. As the Government refuse to debate transport in their own time, Her Majesty's loyal Opposition frequently have to use the time allocated to them for debates on transport. Those of us who have a specific interest in transport were upstairs in the Select Committee on Transport when this debate began. I apologise to the Secretary of State for not having heard his speech. I hope that the Minister for Railways and Roads, as well as the Secretary of State, will not think that I am being unduly familiar if I say that I have heard them once or twice before on the subject. I can quote almost verbatim most of the well-worn excuses that they trot out on every occasion.

Mr. Watts: Without wishing to be discourteous, I could say that the feeling is mutual.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am happy to continue the relationship until the Minister leaves us at whatever point, either because in his Department the only thing that is certain is that there will be a rapid changeover or because the electorate finally get the opportunity to express too plainly their views on the Government's policies on transport and on every other aspect of their political programme.

The reality is that tonight we have one simple and important case. It is nothing to do with the absurdities that we have heard this evening. It is a charge of bad faith. That is the simple, essential charge against the Government. They came to the House of Commons, not in one debate but in many weeks of debates in Committee, and said consistently that they would privatise the railways and bring enormous benefits to the customer and everyone working in the system, but that in order to do so they would not privatise Railtrack. Railtrack, we were told—the core of the system—would remain within state control. That was the constantly reiterated argument.

The Government admitted that they intended to fragment and flog off all the other bits, always to the advantage of the people buying the assets, and every known piece of land to a private company, but they said that that should not worry anyone because Railtrack would remain within the state system; it would not be immediately privatised. The Government soon discovered that from their point of view that was not an acceptable plan. The reason was terribly simple. The privatisation had been forced with indecent haste. It had so little to do with the subject matter that sometimes it gave a certain legitimacy to suggest that the Government were doing it because they cared about transport. The reason they were doing it was very simple: they wanted to fill their coffers before the next general election. There are still Conservative Members—not many—who have a sense of responsibility to their constituents and who know that what is proposed is totally unacceptable and unworkable. Tonight they will have their last chance to vote against it.

The reasons against privatisation have been adduced so often and in such clear terms that we do not have to say to people, "Look at what has happened since privatisation, look at the problems with the safety case, look at the difficulties with people who we were sure were going to produce new rolling stock and improve facilities, and look at what is already becoming clear," because those things are already plain to the travelling public. People who use Euston station have no doubts about the problems and difficulties that arise as a result of privatisation. They can tell us that every train is late—up to 94 minutes late.

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

It is far worse than that. In their period in office the Government have consistently followed one plan in relation to the railway system—to capitalise on the assets and to get rid of the amount of money paid from the Treasury for the maintenance of the transport system. That is why it is quite funny to listen to Conservative Members saying, "Look at the other side of the channel and at what is happening in France. They have got a good system—we do not have one like that." Of course we do not have a system like that in France—it has a socialist Government who put money into infrastructure.

In my constituency, British Rail Engineering Ltd. was sold—a firm that not only was capable of producing high-quality rolling stock but had a long experience of doing so. All the information structures—information services that provide high-quality management control to the British Rail network—were sold off to private departments. A series of small depots were hived off in a way that somehow showed that they were expected to take vast amounts of maintenance work from the old workshops. Of course, because the Government reneged on their promises about the amount of money that they would make available—both for the rolling stock and for the development of new systems—all the people who bought state assets have been faced with the reality that the Government did not mean what they said.

The firm that bought BREL in my constituency was assured that because it was a private firm it did not have to worry—there would be a big order book and there would be a lot of new rolling stock. They were told by the Transport Select Committee that there would be a hiatus for a minimum of three years if privatisation went ahead. However, that was ignored. The private buyers were told, "Don't worry—all the new rolling stock is needed, all the new contracts will be placed and all the new private buyers will find that they are making a large amount of money."

That did not happen at all. Not only was my constituency decimated in terms of jobs, but the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) was so badly damaged that thousands of people lost their jobs. Derby is in the same situation as Crewe. I am referring to rolling stock, which is just one side of it.

The Government have created a highly complex system of financing and they are not prepared to remind the electorate that at the end of all this—when the Government have sold off every platform, every station and every square yard, when they have managed to cheat all the existing employees out of their rights to have any say in the future of their industry—they will still come back to the House and demand more than £600 million extra subsidy for the private system. That is what is happening—that is total effrontery.

The Government are not concerned with creating a modern transport system and they never have been. Their simple aim was to cut down the amount paid by the Treasury in subsidies and to rearrange it in such a way that when it went to the private sector it was not nearly as obvious how much their colleagues in the City were going to walk away with. That is what they have done—and very successfully.

The Government have deprived my constituency of trained jobs, they have deprived the railway system of rolling stock and they have fragmented the basic core railway in such a way that there are real problems with safety, development and management. They have undermined the morale and the future of the people working in the industry and, in return, they have assured us that we do not have to worry about it and it will all be marvellous in the future. That is not only dishonest but unacceptable.

The hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) said that we should look at what happens when people give their views to opinion polls and assess whether that is something that we should worry about. I remind him of an opinion poll that was much more effective: the one for the by-election last week. If that does not make him and his colleagues think seriously, there is absolutely no hope of their treating this subject with the importance that it deserves.

When we go into the Division Lobby tonight, Conservative Members ought to consider strongly the charge of bad faith. It is something that their constituents will hold against them. People are not stupid. They can work out that if the Government sell off Waterloo international station, plus all the land around it and all the benefits of the Euro-line and rolling stock, they are not handing away a debt but giving a positive benefit to a private developer. People do not have to be told that privatisation is a great success—they have only to look at the water service utilities and at the Japanese flag flying over the Greater London council building to know what the reality of privatisation is under this Government.

I am deeply angered by the Government's cynicism and their refusal to take the interests and the needs of their constituents into account. I find it difficult to behave as though Parliament can accept the totally superficial and embarrassing level on which some speeches have been made tonight. To me what is important is that the transport system is being wrecked for purely ideological, purely unacceptable and deeply ignorant reasons. I can only say to Conservative Members: on their heads be it. Frankly, the electorate have noticed what they are about and they do not like it.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Towards the end of her speech, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) accused the Government of creating something far worse than the old British Rail. As she said that, I had a vision of her standing at the Dispatch Box when we debated the gas privatisation legislation. I heard her saying, "Today the Government are creating something far worse than the gas board"—we can now look back and see that the price of gas has gone down 25 per cent. for domestic users. I then saw the hon. Lady speaking on the electricity legislation; domestic prices for electricity have fallen substantially—and they fell in the first three years post-privatisation.

Mr. Wilson: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is interested in historical accuracy, but he will get some. Will he confirm that the price of gas is higher than it was when the Tories came to office in 1979 and started to force gas prices up pre-privatisation? I pre-empt his next remarks and ask him to confirm that, since privatisation, the electricity industry has given less to the Exchequer in tax proceeds than it did prior to privatisation in profits.

Mr. Tredinnick: I shall not trade statistics with the hon. Gentleman, but the gas control centre for the southern part of England, which I visited recently, is in my constituency. There is general agreement that consumers have benefited from gas privatisation and that prices have come down.

Consider the privatisation of British Airways, a remarkable global company. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) quoted what was said by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). What would the hon. Member for Ladywood have said then—that the Government were creating something far worse than the old British Airways? That is nonsense. All the privatisations that have been conducted under my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Baroness Thatcher since 1979 have benefited the consumer and cut the drag on the taxpayer. The old industries imposed enormous costs of about £55 million a week at one time, but they developed into profitable industries and many of them are taking on employees.

What about British Telecom? What would the hon. Member for Ladywood have had to say about "Post Office Telephones"—or was it "Post Office Telegraphs"? I forget. Where would Britain be today if our telecommunications network were still run by the Post Office? I remember selling computer and fax equipment in the 1970s when one could not get telephone lines. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford referred to the problems with telephone boxes, but one could not even get lines installed.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): It used to take weeks.

Mr. Tredinnick: It took weeks. Businesses and private subscribers used to bribe Post Office engineers to stay in during their lunch breaks to put the lines in. The argument that privatisation has failed the consumer is simply not true. The hon. Member for Ladywood has got into a lot of trouble in the past few days over her proposal to put up taxes for the middle classes. She spoke with conviction, and the attempt of Labour party minders to muzzle her was not completely effective. She tried to commit the Labour party in its next election manifesto to a massive further increase in spending, because she talked about getting a high level of services by high investment. We know that she is against privatisation, because she has spoken against it this afternoon. Where will the high level of investment come from? It will come from the taxpayer. Taxes will have to rise if the sort of the investment that she outlined is to manifest itself.

This is one of the most important denationalisation debates in the four terms of this Government. Privatisation will vastly improve the quality of passenger services. I hope and believe that it will improve the distribution of freight, although there is a much work to be done on that. If we get freight right, the cost to businesses across the board will be reduced. I agree with the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) that the Bill is important from an environmental perspective. Environmental issues are, generally speaking, of greater concern to the public than they were a few years ago, and that concern will increase.

What about the quality of service for passengers? When I went to buy a ticket from British Rail, I always felt—especially at main line stations—that I was doing the man behind the counter a favour. The attitude was that I was jolly lucky that he was selling me a ticket. I always resented that and it was quite wrong. Under British Rail, the railways have been run as much for the employees as for the passengers. I do not dispute what the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said about the case for looking after employees. She and the hon. Member for York have argued that case eloquently over the years. Nevertheless, in considering the national railway system the passenger and related issues must be the overriding concern.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined the improvements that have already been provided under the privatisation proposals that have been implemented so far. I will not run over all his points, but he mentioned that South West Trains had introduced new bus services and new waiting rooms. The hon. Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) complained about the lack of facilities and waiting rooms. The truth is that the newly privatised companies are proposing to put in new waiting rooms on those lines. That is how to attract ladies to travel at night and stop the fear to which the hon. Member for Burnley referred.

I will go further and say that privatised services will reintroduce conductors in certain carriages to ensure that people travelling at night feel secure. Other improvements have been mentioned, such as the new motorail services that Great Western has in mind and the South West Trains proposal to put services through to Salisbury and Epsom. Great Western has a significant proposal to put brand-new rolling stock on its express trains.

Labour Members have argued that there will not be any rolling stock improvements and we have heard a lot about banging doors. The facts are different; they are in the public domain and available in the Library. Already some of the services, including Great Western and the Gatwick express, are committed—by 1999 for the Gatwick express—to have completely new rolling stock.

Isambard Kingdom Brunel would have been proud of the newly privatised Great Western. He built that railway to a higher standard than those in the rest of the country with a 7 ft ¼ in gauge. It is a lasting sadness that Parliament decided that that gauge should go. If Great Western decides to run an improved service to the west country, it has the benefit of wider tunnels. The tunnel under the Bristol channel was built to the 7 ft ¼ in gauge for two lines; Sonning cuttings is built for the same gauge. It is possible to run wider trains out of Paddington into Bristol Temple Meads. There are many possibilities of taking ahead Brunel's vision on the west country lines.

I mentioned the possibility of conductors being used on services. Consider the rail infrastructure in New York. On the line that runs from 666 Fifth avenue in the middle of the midtown commercial residential area, the E train that goes to the major airports has guards and special facilities to help passengers. That was done to build confidence in the system. The way forward is the flexibility of the newly privatised companies that will enable additional services to be provided—not a reduction in services.

Privatised railways tend to attract passengers. Two lines run from the centre of Tokyo, the capital of Japan, to the airport. The nationalised railways, which we know are wonderful, include the Shinkansen high-speed rail system which runs around all four islands of Japan. It is one of the finest in the world, but there is also a private line that runs on a snake-like route through the suburbs. I travelled on that line a few years ago. It is a miracle of inventiveness because it is a terrible piece of track, but it is managed in such a way that it is run as a non-stop service despite going through level crossings right through the Tokyo suburbs. It has proved to be a better service and is more popular because it is more carefully managed. It provides what the people want.

One surprising, although significant, aspect of rail privatisation is that the companies that are taking over parts of the network have decided not to create new names, logos or brands, but are using names that go back at least 50 years. Great Western and Great Northern are a return to the groupings that existed before the London and North Eastern railway. Another is Great Eastern. They are names from 50, 60 or 70 years ago.

Why do people still look back to that era as a model to emulate? The straight answer is that those railway companies were run by people with immense pride—by the families who were associated with them. Lord Portman was the last chairman of the Great Western railway and he rode on the footplate at least once a week on his main line—[Interruption.] I will give way to the hon. Lady if she disputes that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I think that the hon. Gentleman has just encapsulated the seriousness with which the Conservative party treats the debate on transport in 1996.

Mr. Tredinnick: I am glad that I gave way to the hon. Lady. I was pointing out that the most important person in the company used to ride on the footplate with the engine driver and the fireman to find out how the service was running. I do not believe that that is happening in the nationalised railway of today.

Mrs. Dunwoody: He was running his office while riding the train.

Mr. Tredinnick: If the hon. Lady wants to intervene again, I shall give way.

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us how many times Bob Horton has been working on the footplate in the past year?

Mr. Tredinnick: The hon. Gentleman is trying to make a point, and I do not blame him for that, but I said riding on the footplate, not working.

Why were those railway companies held in such high regard? Why did they have that esprit de corps? I am provoking Opposition Members. I will give way to the Labour Front-Bench spokesman.

Mr. Wilson: The merest twitch of a muscle and the hon. Gentleman offers to give way. It is very encouraging. We are on a serious point. Let us get a little consensus. Will the hon. Gentleman join me in condemning any of the franchisees that reduce the two-man operation of trains to single-man operation by removing the guard?

Mr. Tredinnick: The hon. Gentleman is very ingenious in somehow linking the good name of the Great Western and Great Northern railways with the two-man system of driving and guarding trains. I do not want to be drawn into a debate.

Mr. Wilson: We are in a debate.

Mr. Tredinnick: We are, and the facts are that some trains can now be run without two men—that happens on the underground in London because of the improved signalling system.

There will be a different level of service on the new railways because of the new blood that is coming in. I shall give two examples of that new blood. A French company is buying in—I should say investing—as is an American company with much experience. That transfusion of new ideas is in no way detrimental to the interests of passengers or of anyone else in this country, and I foresee extra employees on trains.

On the Japanese Shinkansen system, a trolley of food and drinks is constantly taken up and down the carriages and there are telephone services. I understand that Virgin is going to introduce telephone and even television services in the first class section. That is the way to get passengers back. Those needs have to be serviced with such facilities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) and I had the honour of serving on the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill. As you will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, consideration of that Bill took longer than the Great Western Railway Bill in the 19th century. I think that the Committee sat for 300 hours. In fact, we sat for a year—long enough to walk from here to Madrid at a leisurely pace across the Pyrenees with a short stop in Paris. It was an instructive experience considering the difference between the French and British rail networks and the problems of the network in Britain.

Looking to the future, if we imagine Britain's rail network coming into London as the branches of a tree, the channel tunnel rail link, when it is built—and it will be—represents the trunk. As people and freight travel down that high-speed rail link, it will become increasingly important for Britain's links with Europe and its prosperity. That new and vital railway is to be built, not by the state but with private money and to a very high standard. That is another reason why the railways should be privatised. It is incompatible to run the east coast, west coast, midland, Great Western and southern main lines—the five main groupings—as state industries when there is a tendency in Europe towards private systems, which are more effective.

The principal hub in London will be at St. Pancras and there will be another at Waterloo. With the privatisation of our railway companies and the new CTRL line, we will have a dramatically improved service for everyone. Bringing the west coast main line into St. Pancras—the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill Select Committee did not recommend that, but the company that is to build the line has volunteered to do it—is significant and important for all hon. Members whose constituencies lie on or near that line.

I must refer to two more issues, freight and the environment. First, one of the great catastrophes of the post-war British rail network has been the decline—one might say the demise—of freight. It is appalling that so little freight is carried on British Rail. In fairness to British Rail, it has been difficult. The improvement in the road network has been a disincentive, but British Rail's pricing policy and the quality of the service has been poor. If we are to be competitive in Europe and to get our goods over there, we need the enhanced system that the channel tunnel rail link will bring. I certainly welcome the proposed new freight terminals—the one near the M1 and A5 near my constituency will be significant. Through privatisation, I hope that we will not only enhance passenger services but make it easier, cheaper and of greater interest to businesses to put freight back on to rail.

Secondly, on the environment, people are increasingly concerned with environmental matters. The road programme is being cut and there is huge concern about fumes and congestion, as well as worries about protecting our countryside. I do not think that we will see improvements in the scale of the network, which is expanding again, or in the quality of rolling stock and equipment in a nationalised industry. For example, one notices quite a lot of pollution when travelling on diesel trains and I think that the denationalised private companies will start to filter the air on trains—[Interruption.] It is perfectly possible and the public will demand it.

My hon. Friends have referred to improved facilities for the disabled—I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford did so. People demand and expect better facilities for disabled people, and that is absolutely right.

The midland main line goes through Leicestershire and I hope hon. Members will forgive me if I briefly refer to the importance of that line. National Express is the preferred bidder and I understand that the bid is with the Office of Fair Trading. To understand the possibilities for the midland main line when it is privatised, my constituents must consider what has happened with Great Western, South Western and the other lines that have already been privatised.

A betting person would have to say that, given the new facilities that have been introduced, many benefits will flow to the midland main line, which goes from London St. Pancras to Leicester and on to Sheffield. I expect a much enhanced service. Having served on the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill and having always taken a great interest in railways, I look forward to pressing National Express, if it wins the franchise, to provide the kind of service that my constituents expect. If it wins the franchise, that company will have a wonderful opportunity in that the service will finish at the new and soon to be much improved St. Pancras terminus.

Privatisation is the only way forward for Britain's rail system. It will greatly benefit passengers and will enormously enhance their lives and the quality of travel. Privatisation is also vital if we are to get freight back on to the network. It is a disgrace that so little freight is carried by rail. We need to attract it back to the railways to take the pressure off the motorway or road system. The public now have a greater awareness of and interest in environmental matters, and privatisation of the railways will improve the environment, something to which we all aspire.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): The hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) concentrated more on the railways and associated matters than many Conservatives who have contributed to today's debate. He spoke of freight, but the pathfinder prospectus for the sale of Railtrack states that the carriage of freight on the railways has declined for several reasons. One is the collapse of heavy industry in this country—it is mainly heavy materials that are more suitable for carriage by rail rather than by road—and another is the Government's decision to increase to 44 tonnes the size of lorry allowed on our roads.

To say that privatisation will magically shift freight from road to rail, which needs to happen for environmental reasons, and to say that without any evidence of the policy changes to make it happen, is simply to express a pious hope. We need those policy changes, but it will be harder to introduce them when the freight companies are not run by the Government.

The hon. Gentleman said that the quality of service on a publicly owned system is poor and inevitably poorer than on a privately run system, but that is not so. His examples of what a private company could do are already being done by a public sector British Rail. There are telephones on trains—I use them every week going up and down to York. I say "telephones" because there are more than one. A trolley service goes up and down the train offering tea and coffee, and there are complimentary seat reservations.

The man who used to run the east coast main line service travelled on it every day. Unfortunately, he has not won the franchise to run the service. When he ran it as a British Rail service, it made a profit of £76 million a year, which went to the Treasury or to British Rail's coffers and was recycled to provide other services that needed a public subsidy. The person who has won the franchise to run the east coast main line will be paid a similar sum to run the service but he will be subsidised by the Government instead of contributing the profits to the rail network.

It is not true that all public rail services are bad and all private rail services are good. Rail services in which decent investment is made are good and those in which it is not are bad.

The Independent yesterday carried an article stating that Railtrack's executive directors will pick up bonuses this year that could double their salaries. That will cost almost £1 million a year. According to The Independent, the bonuses will be paid in Railtrack shares.

From the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), who has now left the Chamber, we heard the new politics of envy—the Conservative party saying that it is deeply upset that a number of successful business people are contributing to the Labour party. The hon. Gentleman felt that that was a disgrace.

The public in general are angry about the telephone number salaries of directors of recently privatised companies. They are surprised because those directors are doing broadly the same jobs as they did when they ran public sector water companies or various public sector utilities. In the main, their jobs are substantially different from those of directors in sections of the economy that have always been in the private sector.

If a company is manufacturing a product in competition with another company manufacturing the same product, it is perfectly reasonable for someone to be rewarded if he takes market share from the competitor, but the vast majority of the newly privatised utilities are private monopolies.

A senior manager of a big food company in my constituency recently told me that he was seething with anger at the way in which the bosses of the privatised industries had inflated their salaries two, three or fourfold. He was angry because he said that they are not engaged in competition. They work in monopolies and can simply abuse that monopoly to pay themselves more.

The public will therefore perhaps not be surprised by the news in The Independent that Railtrack's executive directors are getting on the gravy train with which we have become so familiar. However, I am surprised because of the answer to a question that I asked on 23 October last year. I asked the Secretary of State:

"how many shares and share options will be issued free or at a reduced price to Railtrack directors when the company's shares are put on the market; what he estimates the total value of directors' free shares and discounts will be; and how many directors will be eligible".

I received a simple, straightforward answer from the Minister for Railways and Roads:

"There will be no share options for Railtrack directors."—[Official Report, 23 October 1995; Vol. 264, c. 581.]

However, we now find that the directors are to double their salaries and that that doubling will be paid in shares.

The pathfinder prospectus, which was issued on Monday, is meant to promote the sale that we are debating, but it reads more like a dodgy estate agent's list of property particulars. We all understand the technique. Such particulars say, "This property has panoramic views", which means that the sunlight is blocked by the gasworks; or they say, "This property has excellent letting potential", which means that it is not suitable for owner-occupation. That very technique is used in the pathfinder document.

The important thing about the 250-page document is not what it says but what it skates over, weaves around, or leaves out. For example, page 15 states:

"It is Railtrack's policy to develop its property portfolio with a view to maximising the benefits to Railtrack's customers and shareholders."

One might have thought that that was a good thing and that perhaps customers might benefit, but the customers are not the passengers. According to the small print, the customers are the 25 train operating companies. In other words, the privatised train operating companies and Railtrack shareholders will get the benefits of the sale of Railtrack's property assets; the travelling public will not.

Railtrack's relationships with the train operating companies were graphically illustrated last autumn by the pathetic pantomime of the publication of BR's winter timetable, which was found to be so riddled with errors that Railtrack was forced to print a 400-page revision. It contained so many errors that Railtrack then published a further 91-page correction. Hon. Members may think that I refer to that incident to make a gratuitous sideswipe at the way in which Railtrack has been run, but I do not raise it simply for that reason. The implication is obvious: Railtrack failed to do the job that British Rail, as a public sector company, managed to execute perfectly twice a year for a long time.

Mr. Hawkins: Surely the hon. Gentleman will concede that British Rail, as a nationalised organisation, was forced to publish substantial corrections to its timetables on several occasions. It certainly did not always have a perfect timetable. If he wishes, I can give him chapter and verse of the many occasions on which British Rail was forced to publish supplementary corrections.

Mr. Bayley: I have seen supplementary corrections to the BR timetable: they are usually quite small and printed on newsprint-type paper. British Rail never published a 400-page correction so riddled with errors that it was followed by a further 91-page correction.

That was a classic failure by Railtrack and it is important to the debate because the timetable is the core document in Railtrack's business. The timetable is enormously important to passengers, who are having difficulty working out when trains will run because of that fiasco.

Page 10 of the prospectus states that Railtrack's principal customers are the train operating companies. It says also that 94 per cent. of Railtrack's income is derived from track access charges, which are based on train movements. The overwhelming majority of train movements—about 99 per cent.—are set out in the timetable. If Railtrack cannot specify train movements correctly in its timetable, it cannot bill the train operating companies correctly.

As the timetable is central to Railtrack's business, the regulator takes an interest in how it is prepared. The regulator has produced track access conditions requiring Railtrack to publish six times a year a timetable—upon which the public timetable is based—for those working in the industry. Linked with the six editions of the working timetable are three consultation and bidding rounds for the train operating companies. As required by the regulator, they receive a draft timetable and they may then bid for changes to it.

As Railtrack is completely unable to run the system properly, the Rail Regulator has been forced to reduce Railtrack's obligation temporarily from six working timetables per year with three bidding rounds to two timetables per year with two bidding rounds. He describes that as an interim measure. However, if one refers to page 31 of the prospectus, one can see that Railtrack believes that it will never manage to meet the Rail Regulator's timetabling conditions. Therefore, it intends to ask for the interim measure to become permanent.

Why is that necessary? As Labour Members warned when the Railways Bill passed through the House, Railtrack has found that a fragmented railway—with many different, competing companies reaching agreements and billing each other for services—is much more difficult to organise and to operate than the vertically integrated, single national railway that existed under the BR system. Therefore, at the heart of Railtrack's business is the computer system into which the train operating companies enter bids for train paths and by which Railtrack bills companies for the paths that they use.

That computer system is ready to crash: it cannot meet the Rail Regulator's requirements for 18 bidding rounds a year and six working timetables. Railtrack intends to ask the Rail Regulator to reduce the 18 bidding rounds to four, as that is all that it can cope with. It also wants to reduce the number of working timetables from six to two.

The old system BR operated was relatively simple: the Protim software system managed train paths in each of the eight BR regions. Information was fed into that system and the timetable was produced. As the operation of the rail system is much more complicated nowadays—companies do not simply register a single journey, but are billed for a journey stage by stage—and as rebates must be paid when the service provided by Railtrack does not meet the specifications agreed with the train operating companies, Railtrack has contracted a computer software company, SEMA, to design a new software system to run its computerised heart.

The system is called A-Plan. Railtrack has spent about £10 million on it, but it does not work. As a result, Railtrack has been forced to go to the regulator and say, "The bidding process that you have specified cannot be met. We must change to a much simpler system not temporarily, but permanently".

Page 32 of the prospectus states:

"In producing each working timetable, information is transferred between Railtrack and the train operators, usually on paper."

It is transferred in that way because Railtrack's computer system cannot perform the task electronically. The prospectus continues:

"New computer systems which will allow more data to be transferred on electronic media within Railtrack and between Railtrack and the train operators are currently being developed and tested".

They are the computer systems that Railtrack was required to have in place and up and running before the sale, but it has failed to meet that requirement. Those are the sorts of dodgy, estate agent-type particulars in the prospectus. I am sure that lawyers have pored over it in detail and that the prospectus contains no information that is untrue. However, I am sure also that many points have been omitted and that many others are intended to mislead.

The Government do not seek to warn prospective investors of the dangers that they face if they invest in a project that has run behind schedule ever since the passage of the Railways Bill and has been devised as it went along. Despite running Railtrack as a public sector company for two years, the teething problems have not been resolved. Railtrack is being sold not as a going concern but as a body that cannot meet the Rail Regulator's requirements.

The computer system is not the only thing that is not ready for the sale. On Monday this week the Transport Salaried Staffs Association released the results of a survey of Railtrack managers. Some 82 per cent. of middle managers working for Railtrack oppose the privatisation of Railtrack and 51 per cent. of senior managers oppose its sale. Almost three quarters of Railtrack managers—73 per cent.—say that the Government should delay the sale. Many of the managers who responded to the survey wrote to explain their views. One of them wrote:

"Asset condition surveys and record updates won't be completed by April."

The prospectus admits that, albeit in a very roundabout way. On page 35, it states in relation to the asset condition of the track:

"Although Railtrack has limited data on ballast renewal requirements, the Directors believe that, based on the knowledge and experience available to Railtrack, they have been able to make a reasonable assessment of the likely rates of renewal of rail sleepers and ballast over the ten years from 1 April 1994."

The prospectus includes some figures, but admits that they are based on guesswork, not an engineering survey of the condition of the track.

In relation to route structures such as bridges, culverts, cuttings and tunnels, the prospectus states:

"Railtrack has undertaken a review of . . . the information it has on the condition of its assets. The Directors are satisfied that, notwithstanding the variable quality of the data currently available . . . they have been able to make a reasonable assessment of the likely requirements for the maintenance and renewal of route structures."

Again, that is based on guesswork.

People are buying into a business where the long-term costs are unknown and unquantified. That applies not only to route structures but to the backlog of maintenance of buildings, stations and signalling. All those issues were meant to have been spelt out before Railtrack reached the point of privatisation. That has not happened. Even to those who are in favour of privatisation it is clear that Railtrack is being privatised before it is ready.

In their response to the survey, the managers said that there were serious safety implications. One wrote:

"Safety systems are not ready."

Another said:

"No safety systems are in place. There is total chaos in my area—possession planning."

That is the business whereby Railtrack takes over the train path from the train operating company in order to carry out maintenance. He continued:

"It is an accident waiting to happen."

We should bear in mind that that was not a small survey; it covered 559 Railtrack managers.

The Government should heed the advice of managers in the industry that they are trying to privatise. If they do not do so, at least some Conservative Back Benchers—some of the 20 per cent. who say privately that they now have doubts about rail privatisation—should vote to delay the sale. In the words of a senior Railtrack manager, the sale

"is an accident waiting to happen."

I represent an important railway town that has been grotesquely affected by rail privatisation. York has lost some 3,000 out of the 4,700 railway jobs that existed when the Railways Bill was presented to Parliament. Many hon. Members have heard me talk about the loss of rolling stock manufacturing jobs, but jobs have been lost throughout the railway industry. There have been substantial job losses affecting those who maintain the track and infrastructure, the managers of rail services and skilled design engineers.

Despite that, and despite the serious consequences of rail privatisation on the economy of my constituents and the livelihoods of thousands of men and women and their families, I do not have a blinkered ideological view of the railways. I do not believe that public is right and private is wrong. I support partnerships between the public and private sectors.

The Labour party is not squatting on the ground of a private finance initiative. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) proposed such a partnership and said that the Ryrie rules on public sector capital investment were an anachronism. When Ministers said that those rules were sacrosanct and could not be changed, the Labour party argued for change. Eventually, the Government saw the sense of that argument and introduced the private finance initiative.

The way in which the Government are going about rail privatisation will not bring extra investment into the railways; it will simply substitute private sector money for public sector money. The Government hope to raise £1.8 billion from the sale. Presumably, they assume that owners of private capital will want to invest £1.8 billion in railways in Britain. Why do we not encourage them to invest in our railways—in new rolling stock, new signalling systems, new lines, repairing the backlog of maintenance, putting right the repairs that are needed and improving the system and the quality of service to the public?

The £1.8 billion will not be spent on improving the railway system. It will simply buy the railway system that we have at the moment and any investment to improve it will have to be additional to that.

One might ask where that £1.8 billion will go if the rail flotation goes ahead and the money comes in. It will go to the Treasury and it will not be invested in the railways. It will be frittered away on one-off bribes to the electorate at the next general election in a desperate—and, I believe, forlorn—attempt by the Conservative party to garner enough votes to stagger on for another term in order to push through even more desperate privatisations of the Post Office and the few public sector investments and endeavours that remain after four Conservative terms in office.

If the Government really believe what they say and want investment in the railway and an improvement in rail services, they should invite the private sector into partnerships to invest in new schemes and improvements, instead of inviting it simply to take over the existing railway without a penny of the proceeds being spent on improvements and frittering away the resources that will be raised.

Instead of being spent on new infrastructure, the huge private sector investment that the Government are encouraging will be spent on maintaining the status quo. If one tenth of that £1.8 billion had been invested in new rolling stock, it could have paid for the new carriages that Kent commuters require and their representatives in the House have promised, and it would have provided them three years earlier. It would have provided two years' work at the York carriageworks, producing 250 new carriages. Why did the Government not go for private investment to provide a better railway? I have given an example of what could have been achieved with just one tenth of the money. If it had all been put into rolling stock it could have bought 2,500 new carriages or created the west coast main line.

Money can be spent only once. Once it has been invested in the existing railway system it will no longer be available to invest in a new system. Railtrack managers are saying that they are not ready for privatisation. Some of them are saying that safety is being compromised by an early sale. If Conservative Members are concerned about the quality of the railway for the travelling public, they should think before they vote tonight and vote to delay the sell-off.

8.9 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): I begin by declaring a lack of interest and an interest. As to the former, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) complained that the Government all too rarely allocate time to debate transport issues in general and railway issues in particular. The hon. Lady should cast her mind back to the various Supply days on the subject of rail privatisation during the course of this Parliament. Consistently in those debates, more Conservative than Labour Members have attended, and Conservative Members have expressed more passion about and interest in the railways. At one stage today, not one Labour Back-Bencher was in the Chamber except the individual who was speaking. That is the answer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich. The Opposition's lack of real interest in the railways should be registered.

I cast an anxious eye over the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who makes a special point of picking up on hon. Members' interests. I declare my own. I have interests in organisations outside the House, but as far as I am aware, none of them has any link with railways. I advise one transport interest, the Chamber of Shipping, and I am extremely proud of that link. I also have shares in the Severn Valley Railway, which give me two third-class tickets each year.

I have shares in Eurotunnel, which I should probably have sold—but some false romantic attachment to the concept of the tunnel meant that I kept them. I used them for the first time for my free tickets to use the shuttle at the Easter weekend. Next time, I speak in the House, I will have shares in Railtrack to declare.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) tried to get off the hook in respect of the accusation that she had failed to declare her interests when speaking in the debate. It is worth recalling that nine members of Labour's shadow Cabinet are sponsored by transport trade unions.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate told the House, in an ingenious piece of sophistry, that such support is no longer sponsorship because moneys are paid to constituency Labour parties rather than to Labour Members as individuals. I do not see the distinction. As I read the rules of the House, if a constituency association or party receives more than £500 from any outside body because of an individual hon. Member's candidature, he or she is obliged to declare it. That declaration must be made in exactly the same way as any other interest.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Is it true also that the Hastings agreement, from which many Opposition Members benefit, pays up to 80 per cent. of election expenses—which can be a sum of up to £3,000 or £4,000? As there are only two legal entities in an election, the agent and the candidate, does that not mean that they receive vast sums of money that are not specified in their declarations?

Mr. Luff: Sensing the mood of the Chair, I will not respond to that comment—except to say that I agree.

I welcome the debate as a good opportunity to get across the truth about the benefits of rail privatisation in general, and of the privatisation of Railtrack in particular. I shall quote several sources to prove the growing tide of realisation that the change will bring real benefits to the travelling public. There is an increasing belief in the value of rail privatisation and that the Government will achieve their objective of getting the bulk of the railways into private ownership or management before the next general election, and increasing disbelief in Labour's ability to deliver or develop any credible rail policy. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North must answer that charge when he winds up.

I read the motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition in amazement. It states that the flotation of Railtrack will "lead to short term profits being put before long term investment."

Do not the Opposition understand that the history of the railway system is that investment in it has been put second, often for reasonable reasons, to all the other many calls on the public purse, and that privatisation will exactly reverse that situation, allowing Railtrack, train operating companies and rolling stock companies to make the investment they deem commercially necessary—and to plan long-term for the first time since nationalisation?

I read with joy the confident words in the Government's amendment, which refers to "a golden opportunity for the railways to gain access to the private finance necessary for investment."

That is the truth about privatisation, and we must confidently trumpet that truth.

The hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) spoke at great length, and about as slowly as some west coast main line trains have to go because of the engineering work needed on that line. The hon. Gentleman seems to think that privatisation will achieve only some kind of delayed status quo. He could not be more badly wrong.

As to the so-called fragmentation of the railways in preparation for privatisation, I see no such fragmentation. The network has been reduced to units that are more responsible to customers, which is a good thing. Lord Hanson is busy splitting up his conglomerate, to make it more responsive. He recognises that it is not necessarily a good thing to have a large company trying to do too many things in too many different spheres.

I have the highest regard for the members of the individual management teams that serve my constituency—particularly Roger Macdonald of Thames and Brian Scott of Great Western. Thames has not been privatised yet, but the bids are in, and I believe that the franchise is due to be awarded in November. The increased responsiveness of Thames to the travelling public in preparation for that change is a joy to behold. Some status quo.

I quote from the Evesham Journal of 4 April:

"It's all change on Sunday's trains.

Sunday morning trains are to be restored to the Cotswold Line from Easter Sunday, April 7.

Three extra trains each way between Worcester, Oxford and London will be introduced in a two-month earlier start to the summer Sunday timetable.

And more services are planned for the main summer timetable which will be launched in June."

Under the old nationalised, monolithic British Rail that Labour is so keen to protect, we were told for years that it was impossible to run Sunday morning trains, for all kinds of reasons to do with the expense of employing signalling staff on Sunday on what is, sadly, a rather under-invested line in terms of signalling infrastructure. Now Thames is providing that service, to the great benefit of the travelling public and of tourism in the Vale of Evesham and Worcester.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I have been listening carefully to some of the hon. Gentleman's claptrap, and it occurs to me to ask him how he can utter such remarks now when he put his name to a Transport Select Committee report produced under the late Robert Adley that came out profoundly and unequivocally against the crackpot method of privatisation chosen by the Government. What has changed since the hon. Gentleman, as a new Member of Parliament, put his signature to that thoroughly researched report? Is it promotion?

Mr. Luff: I was foolish to give way to an hon. Member who has not been present for the debate but who made an opportunist intervention to prove to his constituents that he was representing their interests.

The hon. Gentleman is completely wrong. I put my name not to the report by the late Robert Adley but to a different report produced under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon). If the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) will read the succession of speeches that I have made in the Chamber on the issue, he will see that my support for rail privatisation has been unshaken.

Mr. Wilson rose—

Mr. Luff: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman, because he made a cheap slur against me the last time we debated rail privatisation. I do not feel inclined to give way to him again.

There are other changes for good on the railway that serves my county and constituency. They include improved timetables and better marketing, because there is for the first time an incentive to increase the number of passengers. There was no such incentive in the cosy old world of nationalised British Rail. The passenger service requirement for Thames currently out for consultation looks extremely encouraging.

As for Great Western, I share the joy that the spirit of Isambard Kingdom Brunel is being resurrected in my part of the country. The staff of Great Western share that pleasure. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, responding to the shadow Cabinet spokesperson, mentioned the share offer being made by Great Western to its staff. I am delighted to tell my right hon. Friend that 60 per cent. of Great Western's staff have put up their own money to buy shares in their train company.

The offer is one third over-subscribed. That means that 51 per cent. of that company is now in the ownership of the management or the employees. Those are the real stakeholders of the modern railway that we are building in this country.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luff: No. I have made it clear to the hon. Gentleman that, after last time, the answer is no.

What else has Great Western done? It has achieved—it is an important achievement in itself—a smooth transition to the private sector. None of the passengers would be aware that the transfer had even happened were it not for the smiling presence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the footplate of one of the first 125s into Paddington station at the time of the privatisation. The totally seamless transition proved how easy the process is for people who know what they are doing, as the Great Western management team clearly does.

New products have been designed to make the railway more attractive, including business standard and business first. As a family man, I am especially keen on the new family carriage that is being introduced on Saturdays on Great Western trains. Parents with young children will be encouraged to travel, and it is hoped that the children will play with the other children. Activity packs will be provided from the buffet car, there will be a special children's food menu, and the company is considering the possibility of providing an entertainer on the trains.

Mr. Wilson: You should do it.

Mr. Luff: I would not mind volunteering for the job, because I would quite enjoy it. I have always wanted to volunteer to be Santa Claus on the Severn Valley railway, and I will do that one of these years, when I have the time.

I have given some examples of the way in which services are being improved. That is not the status quo of which the hon. Member for York spoke, but a better railway that is being built and promoted. A new Cotswold business manager is being appointed to promote the railway.

Great Western is refurbishing the railway stock. It is undertaking extensive refurbishment, not just putting a coat of paint on the outside of trains, as Opposition Members have sometimes tried to suggest. It is carrying out a substantial upgrade of the 125 stock, and it is considering the possibility of further investments in the fleet, improving service frequencies and increasing the number of trains. I suspect that the only constraint on the managers of Great Western trains will be the availability of 125 units, and they may have to consider more imaginative solutions to meet the demands that will be put upon them as they build a better railway.

I appreciate that the Opposition will want to dismiss what I am saying, because I am a Tory, and I would say it. But it is not just Conservative Members making such comments. Third party endorsement—by which I do not mean the Liberal Democrats—from individuals not directly connected with the railways or the House is growing. For example, Jonathan Prynn in The Times on February 7 this year, wrote:

"Impressive local managers, who for decades have laboured under the stifling corporatism of a state monopoly, are suddenly finding themselves liberated . . . Proper financial accountability is being established for the first time since nationalisation. Performance contracts set up to provide incentives for the train operators, Railtrack and the maintenance firms should deliver improvements in service."

He continues:

"Once the flotation"

of Railtrack

"is a fact, Labour's game is up. Railtrack is the keystone of privatisation, and once in the hands of millions of private investors, the sell-off will become a legal and financial nightmare to dismantle . . . If it succeeds, privatisation will deliver higher levels of investment, private/public sector partnership, "stakeholder" employee share ownership and improved public services after 50 years of underperformance—all Labour aims. The case for yet another round of upheaval in an industry that has suffered permanent revolution for the past decade"— probably for the past century—

"would be unsustainable."

I have not always agreed with Andrew Neil, but he wrote an article for the Sunday Times on 11 February. He starts the article with an interesting quotation. He says:

"'Call us about rail privatisation,' pleaded BBC television's new Breakfast Extra programme on the day privately owned trains ran on Britain's railway network for the first time in nearly 50 years. 'We want to hear your fears about the future.'"

That has been the attitude of the media to privatisation.

I vividly remember receiving telephone calls from radio companies, television companies and newspapers asking for my views on rail privatisation. When I said that I was in favour of it, the phone was virtually put down at the other end. The callers did not want to hear the good news. A BBC programme—I think it was "You and Yours", but I do not want to malign the producers of that programme, and it may have been another one—before any rail service had been privatised, invited listeners to telephone with their complaints about the privatised railway.

I rang and lodged a complaint with the BBC about that gross misrepresentation of the truth about the railways. People were being invited to complain about the nationalised railway, not the privatised railway.

Andrew Neil continues:

"Fears? What fears? That the trains might now run on time? That somebody might have cleaned them before passengers boarded? That there is more to eat on board than a stale sandwich? That the buffet might actually be open? That surly staff might be replaced by people who welcome our custom? That clapped-out rolling stock might be replaced by spanking new carriages? That the railways henceforth might not be run entirely for the benefit and convenience of Jimmy Knapp's members or the jobsworths on the board of British Rail?"

He concludes his article by saying:

"Investment in public transport. New technology. Passenger protection. Penalties for the poor performance of private enterprise. Social subsidies. Even stakeholding. It reads like a new Labour tract. It is part of the absurdity of our party politics—borne of the public's phobia about privatisation—that the government is likely to get no credit for it, while Labour will continue to win cheap cheers by throwing bricks on the lines in an attempt to derail it."

I intend to ensure that Government get some credit for the undoubted success that rail privatisation will be.

How will the reorganisation work in practice? Contrary to suggestions by the hon. Member for York, it is working well. In my region, in addition to the two excellent managers of train operating companies, we have an excellent regional manager of the Great Western sector of Railtrack in Martin Reynolds. The new train operators and Railtrack are working well together, and they have no complaints about each other. That is as it should be. Railtrack is clearly achieving its objectives with the train operating companies, and ensuring that trains run safely and on time.

The great advantage of the new system is that Railtrack will focus on its customers, and train operators will focus on theirs. Privatisation of both halves of that equation can only sharpen that focus. Both halves of the equation have, for the first time since 1948, an incentive to increase custom. That is what I passionately want, and a nationalised railway will never have an incentive to increase custom.

It was delightful to hear the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) talk about setting targets for increased custom on the newly renationalised railway. Does he really expect us to believe that setting targets generates custom? It does not. Serving the customer well generates custom, and that is done effectively only by a private company. There are now two pressures to increase the use of railways and to replace the cosy, genteel and totally unacceptable decline of the old system.

Sadly, all too often in such debates, the focus is on passengers and we do not discuss the important role of freight traffic on railways. I am proud of the fact that, when I served on the Railways Act 1993 Committee, I secured the first amendment to that piece of legislation when I imposed on the Secretary of State and on the regulator a duty to promote the use of the rail network for goods. The word "goods" was missing from the Government's original clause. Rightly, the Government accepted that amendment, and now the Rail Regulator has a duty to promote the carriage of goods. I am delighted about that.

Mr. Heppell: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Luff: Yes, because the hon. Gentleman has been here for most of the debate.

Mr. Heppell: How much has the carriage of freight increased on the railways since his amendment?

Mr. Luff: That question rather misses the point. Wisconsin Rail, which now owns the freight services of British Rail, is determined to increase the carriage of goods. I am delighted that 90 per cent. of the inward demands for metal of Carnaud Metal Box, a company in my constituency, come by train. That is some 40 to 50-lorryload equivalents each week that do not travel along Worcester's narrow roads. That company tells me that Railtrack continues to give an excellent service, and it is delighted with that facility.

Other companies in the Vale of Evesham are now considering the possibility of putting more freight on to rail. The Vale of Evesham has a crucial role as an importer and exporter of horticultural produce. Two different proposals, one at Honeybourne and one at Blackminster, are currently under active consideration, and the proponents of both schemes tell me that they have excellent relationships with Railtrack and no complaints about the service they receive from it.

Opposition Members have derided the investment record and intentions of Railtrack. That record compares immensely favourably in the immediate past and in the future with anything that the British Railways Board could ever have managed. The list in the interim report for the six months ended 30 September 1995 of major improvements to the network is startling; it includes electrification of Heathrow Express trains; Ashford international station; Birmingham's new £28-million Jewellery line, which provides a significantly enhanced rail service for my constituents from Worcester; the Robin Hood line; and the Leeds north-west electrification.

The list continues. It sets out improvements that have been achieved. Crucially, Railtrack states:

"Following flotation we will, for the first time, be able to implement long-range investment programmes, free from the short-term limitations of public sector finance. We look forward, with great enthusiasm, to showing what Railtrack can accomplish in the private sector".

Mr. Hawkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that the sort of investment to which he has referred should reverse especially the historic decline of freight traffic on the railways and correct the problems that he and I and other Members who were members of the Select Committee on Transport heard described by companies such as Castle Cement, which told us that it had to invest in a huge fleet of lorries because nationalised British Rail could not deliver trains on time to pick up loads of cement to take them throughout the country? That is what Railtrack, in a privatised form, will correct.

Mr. Luff: I have nothing to add to my hon. Friend's entirely accurate observation.

It is interesting that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) chose to give one of his major statements on his attitude to railways to the Morning Star on 1 February. I hope that the brothers read only the first two thirds of his article, which contained all the traditional sops, such as it "is not railway engineering, but financial engineering."

The hon. Gentleman stated:

"The proposed sale of Railtrack is an audacious rip-off on a very grand scale."

It is all there. It is great stuff in the first two thirds of the article.

I hope, however, that the brothers did not read the last third of the article. The hon. Gentleman wrote:

"Perhaps too much time was wasted on empty rhetoric about 'taking back' when it was never our intention to take back every bit of the railways which had been sold off."

The hon. Gentleman added:

"We . . . never intended to bring the rolling-stock back into public ownership . . . We won't take back the freight companies if they are sold . . . Our message to potential franchisees is that we will respect legally binding contracts . . . but . . . there will be no coming back to the trough either for more money or derogations in terms of the level of service."

I should hope not. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would not accede to such requests. I am sure that he would not.

It is incredible. The hon. Gentleman criticises the Government for wanting to privatise the railways, but he set out a list of measures that he accepted. As I have said, I hope that the brothers did not read the end of the article. It is fair to say that it contains nothing about Labour's policies. It merely refers to the bits of our policy that Labour accepts.

Later in the article, the hon. Gentleman wrote:

"In summary, Labour's policy towards the railways is positive, imaginative and utterly at odds with the present follies."

I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can justify that ridiculous claim.

We all know that these issues are splitting the Labour party from top to bottom. In a way, I feel sorry for the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who speaks from the Opposition Front Bench on transport matters. I am very fond of her. I know that she is not fully at home with new Labour. She makes that clear, and I am grateful to her for doing so. I appreciate her integrity and honesty. Nevertheless, Labour does not have a coherent policy to offer.

I rather enjoyed a piece of imagery which I read in The Sunday Telegraph of 14 April, last Sunday. The authors wrote:

"In the film North West Frontier, a fearless Kenneth More"—

I suppose that they mean my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—

"plays an army officer who commands a train half-way across India, battling his way through repeated attacks by be-turbaned rebels, fiendish spies"—

they must be Opposition Members—

"and across half-ruined bridges. Against all the odds the train limps to its destination in the final reel and delivers its rather bewildered passengers to safety."

It may feel rather like that on occasions to Ministers in the Department of Transport. I have every confidence, however, that the train, the Government's policy, will reach its destination safely and deliver a much better railway in the process.

8.32 pm

Mr. John Heppell (Nottingham, East): The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) gave us a good example of "Alice in Wonderland" adventures. He presented us with selective quotations from newspapers. For every person who wrote to him saying, "I am in favour of privatisation," I could provide the hon. Gentleman with a dozen letters of complaint.

When I travelled down to London by train today, a woman sitting in a seat in front of me was complaining that trains were late because of the various changes that had been made leading up to privatisation. She was complaining that there were more train failures. Some failures are extremely serious.

The hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) told us that he was a member of the Committee that considered the channel tunnel rail link. I sat on that Committee for 300 hours, and rather more hours than the hon. Member for Dartford because at the time he was not allowed to take his place in the House for various reasons. I note that the Government Whip seems confused. The hon. Member for Dartford was suspended for a certain period.

Mr. Luff: My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) was not suspended.

Mr. Heppell: I am sorry. If I have referred to the wrong Member, I shall make my apologies after the debate has come to an end.

I dispute the claim of the hon. Member for Dartford that the channel tunnel rail link was privately financed. More public money is finding its way into the rail link now than when the project was envisaged. The Government said that they would not allow the scheme to go ahead with public money. I forget whether twice or three times the amount of public money is being provided now compared with the sum that was made available originally. To use the rail link as an example of the Government's commitment to railways is probably just about right.

I recall a little story that was recounted by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who is the shadow Secretary of State for the Environment. Many Members will have read about the illegal immigrant who escaped from a train as it went through Kent. He jumped off the train. My hon. Friend said, "He wouldn't have done that in France." The French already have a railway in place of which they can be proud. We still have not completed the legislative process, which must be finalised before we can build our railway on this side of the channel.

I apologise to the Secretary of State because I missed his opening remarks. I apologise also to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) for missing her comments. I had an arrangement to meet some carers of disabled people, and I could not get out of it. I did not want to get out of it, to be honest. I understand that the Secretary of State, as well as the hon. Member for Worcester, talked about the Robin Hood line and what a great achievement it is.

The Secretary of State might want to say, "Yes, I have built a railway," and will not go on to say, "Buddy, can you spare me a dime?" I remember, however, why the Robin Hood line was built. I am grateful to the Government for giving support to the line. Effectively, the Government were pretty much railroaded into the project. I remember the decision being taken that the line should go ahead. It was an historic decision.

I should explain that, for years, I had sat on Nottinghamshire county council and had seen road schemes costing £10 million, £15 million and £20 million being nodded through. It was the council's policy to nod through road schemes. When it came to anything to do with railways, the response was, "No. That is a matter for British Rail. The council cannot possibly put any money into railways." With the Robin Hood line, however, the council decided that for the first time it would put money into a new railway. It put aside £6 million and went on to persuade the district councils to make money available so that stations could be built. The county council tried to get money from the private sector. It went also to the Government and to Europe. The Secretary of State would probably agree that the Robin Hood line was the initiative of Nottinghamshire county council. A tunnel was opened, for example.

Privatisation of the Robin Hood line is scuppered. Patronage was double what was expected. Even so, there were difficulties because of privatisation. Access charges increased, and the cost of rolling stock almost doubled. Do not quote the Robin Hood line as an example of how Railtrack privatisation is working.

Perhaps I have raised secondary issues. I did not intend to speak in the debate—

Mr. Dicks: The hon. Gentleman always says that.

Mr. Heppell: No, I do not always make that comment. I usually say, "I shall be brief." I am told, however, that I never am. I did not say that today.

I decided to speak, however, because I was a member of the Committee that considered the Railways Bill, along with the hon. Member for Worcester. I remember the White Paper of 1992. I remember also the full discussion that took place in Committee. We discussed the relationship between British Rail and the regulator, the relationship between the regulator and the franchising director and the relationship between the franchising director and the train operating companies. The hon. Member for Worcester nods and laughs. I remember seeing a diagram—I am sure that I have mentioned this before—of all the different lines of communication criss-crossing a page to show how things were supposed to operate. It was very confusing. I could not understand it, and I worked for the railways before I came here.

As I said, we discussed the consequences of investment and the effect of privatisation on fares and on discounted fares. We had long discussions on safety, and I shall come back to that in a while. We also discussed competition. We do not seem to discuss competition any more. I remember when the former Minister of State, Department of Transport, the right hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), had to get up in Committee and, to the laughs and derision of Labour Members, admit that for a number of years there would be no competition between the train operating companies, which would be running on the same lines and bidding against each other, so that people would take up the franchises. Competition was shoved to one side. Before that, the assertion was that this was not some Orwellian concept. It was not that private is good and public is bad. It was to inject competition into the railway industry. But out it went at a stroke. If somebody can tell me where competition comes in with regard to Railtrack, I shall happily listen.

My main point is that we discussed all those aspects of privatisation in depth, and I feel that we did a good job, even with the Government's limited information that was provided at the time. Never at any time were we told that Railtrack would be privatised. It was the exact opposite. The Government told us that they would privatise the train operating companies and that there might be 13 stations that they would asset-strip and sell off. We complained about that, but we were not told that Railtrack would be sold.

I do not like it, but the Government have a right to pursue a privatisation policy. They are wrong, and the way in which they are privatising the railways is laughable. No one, except the new accountants who have been brought in, believes that privatisation can really work. I see Conservative Members shaking their heads, but I bet that they cannot find anybody—someone whom I would consider to be a railway person—who is not buying in to make a cheap profit and who believes that the system will work.

I emphasise that we were not told about the Railtrack privatisation. I have two quotations, the first of which is from the then Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), who did not have much involvement in Committee. He said:

"Outright privatisation of . . . the railway is not on the agenda for the foreseeable future, not least because subsidy from the taxpayer is needed, and we have made it clear that we shall continue to provide that."—[Official Report, 2 February 1993; Vol. 218, c. 160.]

In other words, he was saying that the railway would not be privatised as long as we are paying subsidy.

In Committee, the then Minister of State, Department of Transport said:

"Railtrack will be in the public sector for the foreseeable future".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 23 February 1993; c. 400.]

Conservative Members seem to have identified a new definition of "foreseeable future". I suppose that we should have heard last week that Labour would not win South-East Staffordshire in the foreseeable future. I think that before the local council elections on 2 May we shall hear that there will be no Labour gains in the foreseeable future. The best one will be when the Government tell us that there will not be a Labour Government in the foreseeable future, because now I understand exactly what that means.

I am not asking the Government to abandon their ideas about privatisation, but at least we used to discuss it. We did not just have one day to debate it in the Chamber; we sat for hours and hours and went through it in detail. No one can tell me that a publicly owned Railtrack, which owns the stations, bridges, tracks, lines and all the other bits that will be privatised, is the same as a privatised Railtrack, with all the bridges, land and so on. It seems to me that when Railtrack is privatised, there will be two possible sources of income. The first will be access charges. Where will the money come from? The train operating companies. Where will the train operating companies get the money from? Government subsidy. Is not that the way in which access charges work? I know that it is the way in which they are supposed to work.

Just this week, the Secretary of State for Social Security told us that there is no such thing as poverty. If he believes that, he should visit my constituency, which has the eighth highest level of unemployment in the whole of Britain; higher even than any Scottish or Welsh constituency. He would see real poverty there. Perhaps the Conservatives still believe in the trickle-down theory. In this case, it trickles down from the taxpayer, through the train operating companies, into Railtrack and then into shareholders' pockets. Nobody can tell me that that is justified.

There is another way in which Railtrack can raise finance—asset stripping.

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton) indicated dissent.

Mr. Heppell: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Initially, the proposals were that 13 stations would be sold off to the private sector and the rest would stay with Railtrack in the public sector. In Committee, we said that that was asset stripping. Individual private companies that took over those stations would be able to sell off the land around stations and make a healthy profit. Now it is worse, because it is possible to asset-strip not just 13 stations, but the lot.

I am worried not only about asset stripping but about the consequences for the future, because I have seen the asset stripping of railway lines before, after Beeching. I shall tell the House what happened. The land that was bought up and used for development blocked off possible future transport links into the city of Nottingham and many other cities across the country. Once land has been built on, one cannot put a railway through it. That is not just asset stripping, but tying up land for the future.

When Conservative Members come to their senses—sorry, I am wrong, because I am fairly sure that they will not. When we have a Labour Government, who decide that we really do want to ensure that the railways expand, with more passengers and more freight, we shall not block off the corridors to allow that expansion by asset-stripping under the present proposals. That is the only way in which Railtrack can raise money. The Government are talking about the sale of the century. They are to give profits to shareholders who do not even own the shares yet. They will be guaranteed £69 million in the autumn—"Buy your shares and get your profit."

How can anybody tell me that that is a sensible proposition, that taxpayers' money should be given to people in that way? I could understand it in some respects if the Government's dogma worked, and if privatisation allowed them to pull back on the subsidy to be given to the railways, but the reverse is true. One ends up paying more subsidy, but getting a worse service than before.

I shall touch quickly on safety. Earlier, I heard an hon. Member—I think that it was the hon. Member for Worcester, but perhaps it was the hon. Member for Dartford—say that there was no reason—I am getting a signal from the Government Whips. I am not too sure whether I am supposed to take notice of them, but now I am getting a signal from my own Whip.

In Committee, I looked at the brief produced by the Health and Safety Executive. My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is right: there were 38 recommendations suggesting ways in which rail safety could not be improved, but could stay at the same level. The recent railway safety case lists 10 actions, many involving substantial cost, which would not make the railways safer but would attempt to make them as safe as they are now.

There is no doubt that the cobweb of confusion that will be created by the new arrangements will lead to more accidents. I am a former railwayman, and, believe me, the "fail-safe" concept was drummed into us. Nowadays I just read the newspapers, but I am certain that the accidents that happen currently did not happen as often in my time. I read about fuel tanks and traction motors dropping off trains; apparently, there are fires on trains and no one can get off because the access has not been worked out. I read about axles snapping. Before that recent instance, when did an axle last snap on a British Rail train? We would have to go back hundreds of years—to the time of Isambard Kingdom Brunel, and the man in a top hat sitting on the footplate. It may seem funny, but I believe that there is something fundamentally and radically wrong with the current safety arrangements.

If Conservative Members do not agree to a review, or at least a discussion in a committee, they have only one option if they are to save the railways: they must vote Labour.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of the debate; I was serving on the Select Committee on Social Security.

First, let me deal with certain issues on behalf of the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety, of which I have the honour to be joint chairman. For about two years the council has had a rail working party, which has made a number of recommendations and observations about rail safety. I am sure that members of that working party, who have a keen interest in—and vast experience of—both the rail industry and the academic aspect of railway matters, would not want me to say anything on their behalf that could be construed as scaremongering. The advisory council does not take such an approach to rail safety issues; indeed, it takes a responsible and positive approach to transport safety issues in general.

Hon. Members have made some rather over-excited comments about safety. I hope that what I shall say on behalf of the advisory council will not be viewed in that light; I intend to offer some positive suggestions. This is nothing new for the council. It has nothing to do with the fact that we are discussing the privatisation of Railtrack, or with the privatisation of the railways. As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, the council has a long history of working with, and campaigning to change the mind of, the Department of Transport.

My hon. Friend the Minister will also know that a number of organisations are currently responsible for safety in the new structure. Each train operating company must submit a safety case to be approved by Railtrack; Railtrack's safety case is approved by the Health and Safety Executive, which includes the railway inspectorate. Although the office of the rail regulator has no safety brief, it can act as independent arbitrator in the event of disputes between Railtrack and train operators. I understand that those arrangements were proposed in an HSE report entitled "Ensuring Safety on Britain's Railways", published in 1993—before the Government's decision to privatise Railtrack.

I want to raise two aspects of safety management, which merit more attention than some of the scaremongering that we heard earlier. The first—about which both the parliamentary advisory council and I are concerned—relates to communication and liaison. The council believes that we must ensure that safety lessons that have been learnt can be easily transferred from one company to another. The previous structure of vertical national ownership had the weakness of inflexibility; the new structure, based on competing units, does not naturally lead to the sharing of knowledge and solutions.

Secondly, much good work has been done on safety in recent years. Both staff and resources have been allocated to improve the safety of both passengers and work force. Will my hon. Friend the Minister consider reviewing the 1993 HSE recommendations?

Let me give my own views on the whole question of rail privatisation. I do not deny that I have expressed reservations about aspects of it in the past; indeed, I still think that it would have been better to "regionalise" the railways and sell them as a separate unit. Despite those reservations, however, I will not accept the invitation issued by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody).

When the House has voted on rail privatisation issues in the past, not only have I stood on my feet to express the view that I have expressed again tonight, I have on occasions voted with the Opposition. Indeed, I remember well supporting the so-called wrecking amendment to allow BR to bid for franchise. That does not alter the fact that, at that stage, the House was debating legislation, amendments were before it and the debate would have had some practical effect. Tonight, we are not dealing with the Opposition trying to bring influence to bear on the Government's policy or their attitude towards the nature of rail privatisation. We have heard not helpful suggestions but hostility to the concept of privatisation in any form. That is where I differ from Opposition Members.

I am also aware that this Opposition debate has nothing to do with the issue itself and is all about something else. It is about trying to persuade Conservative Members such as myself who have expressed reservations in the past to join the Opposition in the Lobby in the hope that they can inflict an embarrassing defeat on the Government that would have no practical effect whatever. I am not going to be tempted.

I have every respect for the Opposition. Indeed, it is their duty on every occasion to try to embarrass the Government. But I am sorry, when I speak on rail privatisation in this Chamber and cast my votes on it, I want them to be cast on the issue. I am not here to help the Opposition do their job in merely trying to embarrass the Government. People in the great wide world should understand the difference between when we debate legislation and when the Opposition are merely trying to play politics with such an important issue. There is no way in which I shall support the Opposition this evening.

I hope that Opposition Members will stop accusing the Government of being purely dogmatic in their approach to rail privatisation. I have views on the alternative ways in which rail privatisation could have been brought about, but I am in no doubt that some form of privatisation is necessary for British Rail. That is fairly obvious to anybody who has travelled on it over the years. They recognise that improvements must flow from privatisation, as they have from the range of privatisations pursued by the Government.

The Opposition are not interested in what sort of privatisation we propose—they would oppose privatisation of British Rail whatever its nature. Labour talks about Conservative Members approaching the matter on a purely ideological basis, but Labour is the ideological party in this respect. The Opposition have opposed every privatisation. Privatisation in general has been a great success for the people of this country, and I know that the only way in which that success and its benefits can be maintained is to ensure that the party that pretends that it will not overturn privatisations and that it has accepted the change in the culture does not take office. In its heart of hearts, as it has proved tonight, Labour is still bitter about everything that privatisation represents and against the private sector in general. I shall do all in my power to ensure that it never takes office.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) said, and I agree with him in one respect. It should be said in the Chamber that, like him, I was serving on a Select Committee this afternoon, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Time and again, the people who run this House—the Leader of the House and perhaps others—arrange transport debates or Opposition Supply days when hon. Members who want to participate and who demonstrably have an interest in participating are in Committee, and hon. Members who perhaps do not have a bona fide excuse for not participating do not attend. Parliament is serving the fare-paying public badly when such an important debate is so poorly attended.

I hope that the party managers will in future get their act together so that members of the Transport Select Committee can attend such transport debates and hear the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) and by the Secretary of State. We were denied that opportunity today because of the way in which the people who manage the House have acted.

Having got that off my chest, I want to say that a lot of rubbish was spoken by some hon. Members, who diverted this important debate on rail privatisation into avenues relating to trade union sponsorship and so on. Some Conservative Members receive thousands of pounds from trade unions—quite legitimately—for acting as consultants, but that is not deemed to be inappropriate. That is a matter of fact—one such Member is in the Chamber at present.

There is some agreement among the political parties about the parlous state of our railways. We agree that the railways are clapped out, that staff are demotivated, that we have a shortage of staff, that we have high fares and that the fare-paying public are sick and tired of our deteriorating rail transport system. The public want remedies, and that is where the parties differ. The fare-paying public believe that the parlous state of the railways is a result of the repeated starvation of resources by successive Governments, but particularly by the present Government who have been in power for a long time. They know that our railways are clapped out because of the failure of the Conservative Government to provide proper funding. That is the real problem.

The Government are now trying to extricate themselves from their embarrassment and kick into touch the problem by flogging off this important infrastructure asset in such a way that the damage will not occur in the time in office of the current occupants of the Treasury Bench. The public want investment in our railways, and they want a modernisation of our railways. They understand that the fragmented scheme that the Government are proposing is a prescription for disaster, and will bring us to the brink of a second Beeching. If it goes ahead, the result will be higher fares, a diminished service and the closure of intermediate stations—particularly as the real estate is flogged off by the new owners of Railtrack. There will be a different map of our railway network a decade from now because of the actions of the Government. There is an opportunity tonight for Conservative Members—those who are in the Chamber—to stop the Government going down this foolish path. I hope that, even at this stage, they will join us in the Lobby and put the freeze on this crackpot course.

The hon. Member for Cheadle said that he thought the proposed method of privatisation was foolish, as did the late Robert Adley. The scheme was not designed that way, however. The previous Secretary of State for Transport said that the Government were not going to privatise Railtrack for a long time. But the Government are running out of resources, they are running out of a legislative programme, and there have been changes on the Treasury Bench. The Government should have disposed of Railtrack in the way proposed by both the late Robert Adley and the hon. Member for Cheadle—if they had to privatise, they should have sold off the track and the trains on a regional basis. But that plan was abandoned by earlier Tory Secretaries of State, and the Government are now compounding their errors by selling off this important infrastructure because it is valuable real estate.

[Mr. Andrew Mackinlay]

My constituents have suffered from the franchising process already. They have seen the halting of the London-Tilbury-Southend line franchise—the misery line—at the 11th minute of the 11th hour, and we do not now know what is going to happen. One thing revealed by the aborted LTS franchise was that the passenger service requirement was not worth the paper it was written on. When Enterprise Rail was creating its shadow franchise in the build-up to the sell-off, we were told that there would be four trains an hour at peak hours. At first glance, one would think that that broadly matches the present situation. But if one cross-examines and probes that statement, one finds that it means two trains one way and two trains the other way—there is no guarantee that the existing inadequate service will be maintained following rail privatisation. We have in a sense looked into the abyss, and we know that what happened to the LTS line is likely to happen elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), who is not in his place, spoke a lot of humbug about trade unions. He also raised the question of safety. He alleged that Opposition Members were scaremongering. On my London-Tilbury-Southend line I already have a number of important privatised junctions to various industries along the river frontage. Lines go off at junctions with signal boxes to an Esso plant, car freight depots and Vandenburgh and Jurgens. I am concerned because we are already suffering from the fragmentation of control and the training and employment of staff, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) has referred in interventions.

On 10 April an incident occurred on a private track off the LTS line in my constituency. A freight train was going in or out of a private yard and there was an incident on the crossing. The private train, going into a private yard, was left sticking out on the main line and the fare-paying public on the LTS line were left stuck, not in stations, but on trains for two and a half hours because the privatised signalman, or his crossing, was not operating properly. There was absolute chaos and a potentially enormous hazard was created. That scenario will be compounded as track and operators are privatised. We will find that the frustration of people who pay fares will increase because their trains will not run. Various organisations will blame each other and argue about who should remedy the situation. I believe that dangers will be created as a result of the fragmentation of control.

I am about to conclude, but I am grateful to see that some more Tory Members have come into the Chamber. On the last occasion when I spoke, I referred to all the stations on the south-west lines. I shall not go through the litany again. In a few years' time when their constituents are complaining, Tory Members of Parliament here tonight, if they are still Members of Parliament, will put the violin music on in the background and say how dreadful it is that their stations have closed, there are no trains at weekends, fares have gone up, and so much has changed on the railway network. Some branch lines will have closed. Tory Members will put on a phoney act of weeping and gnashing of teeth saying that it was not them. We shall remind them that it was they who went into the Division Lobby prepared to sell off this public asset to the disadvantage of their constituents. If and when it happens, they will be to blame.

I hope that when my right hon. and hon. Friends get on the Treasury Bench, they will be able to minimise the impact of this foolish privatisation and, with some boldness, bring back into public control, if not public ownership, our railway network.

9.12 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): We have heard some valuable speeches from Labour Members. I particularly recommend that Conservative Members, if they are capable of listening and learning, listen with respect to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell), who spoke about safety. It takes someone who has worked on the railways, as he has, to understand the complexities and the folly of what is being done and to set aside on the basis of that reality the trite reassurances that Tories offer to themselves. They are playing with fire in this privatisation.

Just as important, as I have said throughout this process, and just as wrong as the privatisation, is the process of fragmentation on the railways. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) said, the Government can take no comfort from anything that the Health and Safety Executive has said at any stage in that process. It has said specifically that an inherently less safe, more dangerous railway is being created. It has made recommendations to counter the fragmentation process. If the Government are prepared to put in place an inherently less safe railway network, what kind of responsibility to society does that show? Steps of enormous complexity have had to be taken to guard against what the Government are doing.

Let us get rid of one of the international canards and be absolutely clear that no Government or country has embarked on anything remotely resembling the process of rail fragmentation in which the Government are now engaged. I would suggest that no other country has done that not for ideological reasons but for safety reasons; other countries have realised and accepted that a fragmented railway system is inherently less safe.

I shall quickly refer to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), because I would be in terrible trouble if I did not. I have great respect for what he said and I share an interest in the subject. I call on the Minister to address the important concerns about the Forth bridge, to which my hon. Friend referred today and which he has pursued tenaciously over many months.

I refer to the speeches of Conservative Members. Today I thought—not for the first time in this long process of debating rail privatisation—would that Robert Adley were with us at this hour. I have noticed the empty Government Benches. I refer to the Tory Members who signed the amendments that Robert Adley drew up, which included measures to give British Rail the right to bid for franchises. Where are they tonight? They have escaped to their tents with their knighthoods—and I hope also with their consciences. They signed the amendments and they knew the wrongness of what was being done. As soon as the leadership and the courage of that one Tory Member disappeared—for the most tragic reasons—they deserted the cause to which they lent their names.

Mr. Day: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not referring to me because on that occasion I voted with the Labour party on the amendments in relation to British Rail being allowed to bid.

Mr. Wilson: I am glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman voted for that—and I am not sure whether he was one of the Conservative Members who signed the amendments. I remember very well that the last time I met Robert Adley in this place was in the Members Lobby. He told me with great pride that he had six Tory names on the amendments. I asked him whether they included the right to bid and he said, "Of course, that is the one that matters. That is the one that will scupper the whole thing."

Six Tory Members put their names to the amendments—and they have disappeared like snow on a dyke or cowards off a battlefield. That amendment was won in this place and the Ministers sitting here tonight have reneged on it shamelessly. I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman puts himself in the same category as other Conservative Members if he votes for the wrongdoing that is continuing and that is in direct contradiction to the amendments that he claims he voted for in the past.

We have heard a lot of fantasy politics tonight—about all, about the wondrous gifts that will be bestowed on the railways through this fantastic process of fragmentation and privatisation. There is absolutely no evidence in that regard—it is fantasy politics, it is a wish list of all the things that the companies will do. All we are asking tonight is that the process be slowed down so that what has happened thus far can be reviewed.

Of course, to Conservative Members, we are asking for the impossible. They are not interested in the arguments about what has happened so far. They are not interested in the implications for the taxpayer or for the passengers. They are interested only in rushing this measure through before a general election as part of the general scorched earth policy. Asking them to slow down is asking them to abandon the policy because they know that they will not be here in office to live with the consequences.

That is part of the immorality of what has been done. There is no interest in the implications, because other people, other politicians and other generations will have to clean up the mess that will be created. They are politicians without responsibility for they are legislating for a period when they will not be in office to live with the consequences.

Mr. Pike: Although what my hon. Friend says is true, will not the proceeds of privatisation have been squandered and lost for ever more?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is right. Many of the assets, and the people, will have been squandered as part of this reckless wrecking process. I have said before that people who believe in Tory rebellions probably also believe in the tooth fairy, but I am told that some of the Tories who might have rebelled give as a reason, strangely enough, for not voting with us tonight the South-East Staffordshire by-election. Tory Members come up to us quietly and say, "We would love to, but it is too dangerous now to vote against the Government because it could bring the whole pack of cards tumbling down." That is the new line of rationalisation. That is one way of interpreting the lesson of South-East Staffordshire; but if they had started re-examining policies such as this, they would not have been in the mess they were in there.

I listened to the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) this morning—before he was carried off by the men in white coats—reacting to questions on the "Today" programme. He was asked in the mildest of manners by Miss Sue MacGregor what would be the equivalent of the dramatic action before the last general election when Thatcher was disposed of and the poll tax dropped. He chose to concentrate on the parallel—I can understand his mind being active on this—between the fate of Baroness Thatcher and the current position of the Prime Minister. He might have concentrated on what legislative measure should be dropped before the next general election. If he had done, rail privatisation might have occurred to him, because the one is as unpopular as the other.

Instead of the dreams of Conservative Members about top-hatted managers travelling on footplates—at one point we had refreshment cars going up and down the engines—let us consider what is really happening. The smugness, complacency, ignorance and contempt that they display in the name of privatisation are beyond belief. There is a private railway industry in Britain; it is called manufacturing. There are hundreds of splendid privately owned and operated companies that work in the railway industry—and good luck to every one of them. Many are doing well in the export field, which is what is saving them.

What have the Government done in the name of privatisation to private manufacturing industry in the railways? Some 8,000 jobs have gone. The great railway town of York will never build another train. The Government have ignored all the warnings about the blight on investment in the railways. They brushed it aside and said that it would never happen. For 160 years, Britain led the world and built trains for the world. In every one of those years, Britain built trains for our national railway network. Since the lunatics were put in charge of the asylum, there have been three solid years without a single train being operated, and the existing private railway industry—the manufacturing industry—is bleeding to death. That is their first achievement in the name of privatisation.

What about the record on employment so far? Eight thousand jobs gone in railway manufacturing. They do not care about that. Jobs have started to go at South West Trains. They will start to go in every franchise. That is not because the railways are overmanned—there have been massive efficiency gains in the past few years, especially through the organising for quality programme. It is not because those people are not needed for a safe, good railway or to deliver a service to the disabled and to elderly passengers. It is simply because the franchisees have entered into contracts from which they have to work backwards in financial terms. They cannot control the costs of access charges or of leasing trains. The only variable cost worth talking about is the cost of labour. To make it pay, they have to get rid of people. That has implications for service and safety and is the inexorable logic of this privatisation.

Mr. Dover: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in any industry, productivity is the name of the game? If management, particularly new management, can get more out of the work force, so much the better.

Mr. Wilson: It is an interesting philosophy, and productivity is the name of our game, but—this is where the two sides of the House differ—it is not the name of the only game. It is certainly not the name of the only game when one is delivering a public service. A safe and efficient public service is also part of the game, but that is neglected in all this privatisation because, within seven years, the companies have to squeeze their profits out of franchises that they have entered into on the basis of fixed figures. I would expect the hon. Gentleman to understand that distinction.

We are told that hundreds of companies have been busting a gut to get hold of railway franchises. Look at the London-Tilbury-Southend line fiasco—the Government did not do very well there, did they? What about the Resurgence Railways fiasco, when Ministers were prepared to give away Great Western to a failed double-glazing salesman? We have heard several hon. Members say what a wonderful job the Great Western management are doing under the privatised franchise. As the Government are well aware, the management owe to the Opposition the fact that they are doing the job at all. Their bid had been chucked out. The franchise was going to be given to the double-glazing salesman and the vice-chairman of the Huntingdon Conservative association, until the Opposition managed to establish, by the simple process of looking at the records at Companies House, what a shower of shysters they were. It was only at that point that the Resurgence Railways bid was thrown out and Great Western management brought back in.

Stagecoach appeared on the scene as a white knight, with its 22 references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission behind it. On Network SouthCentral, it was the Compagnie Generale des Eaux—described in the most flattering terms by a French judge as one of the two most corrupt companies in France. Doubtless, as we meet, Ministers are desperately trying to attract the interest of the other.

The east coast main line has been handed over to James Sherwood within weeks of his saying that the franchising formula was a formula for a no-investment railway. He went to the only place in the country where £1 billion of public money has been invested in the railway and was given that franchise instead. That meets his criteria—he does not have to invest—and it meets the Tories' criteria, as they have managed to give away the most valuable piece of the British Rail network.

The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) had something important to boast about. He said that, within seven years, the east coast main line would be a service that no longer required public money. He must be suffering from a serious loss of short-term memory because, two years ago, the east coast main line not only did not require public money but was such a profitable piece of railway because of the public money that had gone into it that it cross-subsidised the remainder of the inter-city network. That is what we believe in. Where there is investment, there is profit and east can subsidise west, day can subsidise night and urban can subsidise rural services. That is the way to run a railway network.

If it is Tory management of the economy to take out of the network the part that has had the bulk of public investment in the past 10 years and then wave a flag saying that in seven years' time it will not need a subsidy, no wonder the Government are in a dire plight.

We heard a miraculous statement about South Eastern Trains today—there will be investment in trains for the line. That is great. The trains are 50 years old, so let us hope that there is going to be some investment. I wonder why, last week, when the Government announced a parallel contract that has been awarded for Network SouthCentral, which has exactly the same conditions and age of rolling stock, there was no mention of any new trains. Where are the Members of Parliament who represent that area? A couple of the usual suspects have been waving their flags today and welcoming the prospect of new trains for South Eastern Trains, but where are the Tory Members for the Network SouthCentral area? Their commuters have been told that, because of the glories of the franchising system, there will not be any new trains for another seven years.

I can tell the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and whoever else was cheerleading today that they should not count their chickens. If I were told by any of the jokers on the Government Front Bench that there would be new trains in three years' time, when even the most simple arithmetic told me that that is two years the other side of a general election, I would not put that assurance into the election address just yet, particularly because that contract has not yet been awarded. That is the difference—the one that has been awarded contains no mention of new trains for Network SouthCentral, whereas the one that has not been awarded represents another promise to be added to the wish list.

I could go on about the details of franchising, but I am a mere artisan; let us leave it to the master, to the man who has recognised the real potential of franchising, the saviour of the Tory party who represents the symbiotic relationship—the back-scratching—between the Tories and Stagecoach. I see that Mrs. Gloag is now the second richest lady in the country; perhaps she will now be applying for the position and the money of the richest.

Probably unaware that he was being reported addressing what is jokingly called the British Venture Capital Association, Mr. Brian Souter, the chairman of Stagecoach, got on to the subject of rail privatisation. His comments combine the issue of franchises with the question of what kind of deal the taxpayer is getting. In his after-dinner speech to the British Venture Capital Association, Mr. Souter spelt it out in terms with which I would not begin to compete. He is reported as saying:

> "There was a £4bn integrated rail business which had £800m of government subsidy. Now there is a desegregated £9.5bn rail business with £1.8bn of subsidy. While everybody else was taxing themselves about the structure of privatisation, we stuck with a very simple question: what happened to the £1 billion?"

According to the report, there was "approving laughter" from the assembled entrepreneurs.

I can tell the House what happened to the £1 billion. It is coming out of the Treasury, not to create a single extra service or to run an extra train—far less to order a new one—but to be the extra raft on which the whole superstructure of privatisation is to be floated. Two years ago, £800 million of taxpayers' money was going into the railways; now £1.8 billion is going into the railways, not for an extra service or an extra train but solely to sustain the profits and superstructure of privatisation. That is what it is all about.

Let us now deal with investment. We hear investment spoken of as if it were something new and as if it had never been made in the railways before. Let us consider the evidence of Richard Hope, a well-known authority in the railway industry. Railtrack came out with a statement about a £10 billion—£1 billion a year—investment programme, on which Richard Hope's comment was "Big deal!" Railtrack's own written evidence to the Select Committee on Transport on 2 February 1995 says that

"annual steady state maintenance should be £800m which"— these are Railtrack's words—

"'does not provide for any catching up of outstanding work' . . . Renewals are given as £570m . . . so steady state spending on the rail infrastructure should be not less than £1370m."

To maintain the current condition of the railway requires £1,370 million a year. Despite the ballyhoo, Railtrack is offering £1 billion a year.

The proof is in the pudding. If Railtrack were offering some new investment instead of a reduction, it would be talking about electrification schemes and Tory Members would be able to return happily to their constituencies, whether in Blackpool, Aberdeen or any of the other places where there have been good, credible campaigns for rail electrification. However, unless a Tory Member lives within a three-mile radius of Heathrow, he cannot promise his constituents electrification because there will not be any for at least the next 10 years. The word "electrification" does not appear in Railtrack's 10-year investment plan. That is the reality of its investment programme.

For all that the Tories despise the public sector, I know that, in my constituency and in every part of the country to which I travel where electrification has taken place, it has been of immense benefit to the routes and communities that have it. It was delivered by the public sector, but we are now told that, for the next 10 years, there is to be no electrification by the private sector. To be parochial for a moment, I hope that the two Tory Members from the north-east of Scotland who won their seats by promising that the only way to deliver electrification to the north-east of Scotland was through privatisation will lose their seats, because they now have to say that the only way to guarantee that there will be no electrification is through privatisation. What they said was the reverse of the truth.

Sir Roger Moate (Faversham): The hon. Gentleman's problem is that most people remember that, for all its good intentions and commitments, the last Labour Government reduced investment in the railways not for one or two years, but year after year. The hon. Gentleman derides our investment plans through the private sector, but will he confirm what commitment a Labour Government would make to investing in the railways? How much would a Labour Government invest in a public railway system?

Mr. Wilson: Why look in the crystal ball when one can read the book? Two years ago, investment in the railways was at its lowest level in real terms since nationalisation in 1948. I can point to a record of investment, but the Tories can point only to dreams of investment. They now have an investment bible which, by their own admission, will yield no new electrification schemes around the country.

I shall run through some of the flotation arguments. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) has already drawn attention to a grubby little document that tells every unsolicited recipient of it that "Railtrack is not an operator of trains . . . It is essentially a property company and the land that Railtrack will own could be regarded as one of the most valuable pieces of real estate in the UK".

That is how the sale of Railtrack is being marketed. I ask the Secretary of State what action the Government have taken against one of their official share shops for describing Railtrack as a property speculation company. If he intends to pursue it over that matter, he can also inform it that, when Labour comes to power, we will quickly take regulatory action to ensure that every penny in property proceeds from the railways is reinvested in the railways, as occurred in the past. The Tories are yet again selling their product in a manner that is in breach of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968.

I refer briefly to the £69 million of taxpayers' money. We must understand what is going on. I thought that, according to the theory of capital, investment is about risk; yet taxpayers' money is being recycled as Railtrack's profit. It will be sprinkled like confetti among Railtrack's shareholders—not one of whom was a shareholder when the money was raised. Where is the morality in that and where is the risk?

Some £69 million will be given as a bribe to potential shareholders. It could have paid for major electrification projects such as the Glasgow, Queen Street to Edinburgh line or the north trans-Pennine Leeds to Manchester and Liverpool line. It could have been used to replace the remaining Kent coast rolling stock. There are no ifs, buts or talk about in three years' time: that is what the £69 million could have achieved. Will Tory Members of Parliament representing Kent constituencies take that message to their constituents instead of the bogus one that they were peddling?

I turn to the last of the great incentives and the letter from Mr. John Welsby. I would love to scrutinise it in great detail, but time is pressing. The Tories' deceit is again writ large: if the letter had not been leaked, we would never have known that the chairman of British Rail had written to the permanent secretary at the Department of Transport, with copies to Mr. Roger Salmon and Mr. Robert Horton, saying that the Railtrack prospectus contains several fundamental untruths. The prospectus is seriously misleading. It fails to inform potential investors of Railtrack's performance as manager of the rail infrastructure network and it fails to provide them with "material information", in the words of Mr. Welsby.

Investors have not been told the truth because Ministers will do anything to carry through the privatisation, irrespective of the taxpayer, the travelling public, of decency and of promises made to the House. That is what the Tories are about. They may win the vote tonight and privatise the rail industry, but they will pay the electoral price every day until the general election.

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): Those who rely on leaked documents are unlikely to get to the whole truth. The letter from which the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was quoting was written in response to a request to the British Railways Board to comment on the first draft of the prospectus.

One of the points that Mr. Welsby made in the letter was that there should be a clearer exposition of the role and powers of the regulator. The letter from the Rail

[Mr. John Watts]

Regulator containing the statement that is now printed in the pathfinder prospectus was sent by Mr. Swift the day after Mr. Welsby's letter. As the reply from the Permanent Secretary indicates, all the concerns expressed by British Rail have been taken fully into account in the final version of the prospectus, which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) has not seen because it has not yet been published.

Ms Short: Is this one misleading?

Mr. Watts: That is the pathfinder prospectus and I am not saying that it is misleading. The hon. Lady has difficulty in putting the right words in her own mouth. She should not try to put words into mine.

This is probably our sixth rail privatisation debate in 15 months. The Labour party is obviously over-ambitious in trying to fill a full day's debate. Although the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), who is not in his place, had difficulty squeezing into the debate, throughout the afternoon Opposition Members struggled to find anything new or relevant to say. Even the hon. Member for Ladywood could manage only a 20-minute speech.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Watts: I shall respond to the hon. Gentleman's point later. If I give way now, I shall have less time to do so.

It is clear that, after all this time, the Opposition are still trying to fill their policy vacuum in transport, as in much of their approach to politics. What should they do if they have a policy vacuum? The Labour motion suggests that the answer is to call for "a thorough review". Is its alternative to a policy to fill the vacuum with calls for a thorough review?

Reading on, I find some of the aims in the motion wholly admirable. It aims to secure "higher levels of rail investment, improved services" and finally, and quite importantly,

"the best possible return on taxpayers' money."

The problem for the Opposition is that our policy, not theirs, meets those objectives. Having struggled for so long to find a policy, why are they so shy of adopting their normal approach, which is simply to embrace ours? They have done so on many other matters of policy, so why do they not on rail privatisation?

As my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) reminded the House, the shadow Cabinet, reliant as it is on the support and sponsorship of the trade union movement, is unable to adopt an honest policy because the union bosses will not allow it.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North mentioned the investment plans of Railtrack and quoted rightly the statement that Railtrack intends to spend more than £1 billion a year for the next 10 years. What he did not quote, although he could have found it in the pathfinder prospectus from which many hon. Members have quoted so readily throughout the debate, was that in the five years to 31 March 2001 Railtrack intends to spend approximately £8.125 billion. That appears to be higher than the £1.37 billion that the hon. Gentleman said was necessary to achieve steady state spending.

My hon. Friend the hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) dealt with the only real news of the day when he welcomed the announcement that, in letting the franchise for South Eastern Trains, there would be a requirement for new rolling stock. Incredibly, I heard during the course of the day that the trade union front organisation, Save Our Railways, said that it was opposed to that idea. It cannot even accept one piece of good news.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North asked how a promise to be fulfilled in 1999 could be given any credence. The final bids, which are to be made on the basis of the replacement of the rolling stock, must be with the franchising director by mid-June. When the franchise is let, the new franchiser will be locked into a contractual commitment to meet all the terms of the franchise agreement, including that to replace rolling stock. My hon. Friends know that they now have a promise on which they can rely, which they have not received from the nationalised railway industry.

Sir Roger Moate: Did my hon. Friend note that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) expressed real disappointment that the order had been announced—and he got that wrong, as he did almost everything else? The hon. Gentleman said that the rolling stock would not be ordered until 1999. He missed the point that the rolling stock that will be life-expired by then must be replaced by 1999.

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend is exactly right. It is not just South Eastern that will have new rolling stock, because the contract for the 15-year franchise for the Gatwick Express requires a commitment to a completely new fleet of rolling stock. The first franchise for Great Western contains a commitment for the total refurbishment of all rolling stock in return for a 10-year franchise. A couple of weeks ago, Porterbrook Leasing announced a £40 million-plus deal with ABB for the refurbishment of other InterCity stock.

The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) made important points about the Forth bridge. It is absolutely clear that responsibility for the safety and maintenance of the Forth railway bridge lies firmly and squarely with Railtrack. The bridge is part of Railtrack's existing infrastructure, which it has a commitment to maintain. Furthermore, the Health and Safety Executive has powers to ensure that Railtrack honours its obligations to maintain the bridge in a safe condition. The executive has said that it is minded to serve improvement notices on Railtrack. Whether that is necessary is a matter of judgment for the HSE, but I understand that Railtrack has fully accepted the recommendations made in the report. As for the hon. Gentleman's other important and more detailed points, perhaps he will allow me to give him full answers in writing.

Mr. Dalyell: Perhaps many millions of pounds are involved. Should not that obligation be made clear in the prospectus?

Mr. Watts: Although the hon. Gentleman may be well—[Laughter.] The hon. Gentleman is obviously well. He may well be right that the cost of the repairs may run into millions of pounds. I have been talking about investment and renewal obligations running into billions of pounds. In any event, from today's debate the significance of the Forth bridge will be seized upon by people outside the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for South–West Bedfordshire (Sir D. Madel) raised three matters, including the Dunstable bypass, which he introduced intriguingly by suggesting that savings made by the efficiencies of rail privatisation might be used to fund it. I will not make any commitments about sources of funding, but it is our intention to take forward the proposals for a planning conference and to examine the Dunstable bypass and associated transport issues in the area, including rail issues, as quickly as possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire expressed concerns about track-side safety. Under the new safety regime, which is much more rigorous than that which existed before restructuring, every business that undertakes work on the railway must prove its own safety case as a prerequisite of being permitted to undertake any work on the line. My hon. Friend the Member for South–West Bedfordshire mentioned the west coast main line. Railtrack has already let two contracts for the development of the new signalling and control system, and a third will be let shortly. Contracts for the main works will start to be let from June. The core project will be funded through existing, standard track access charges. Funding may be required for additional upgrades. Those matters will be considered when the cost and technical reviews of upgrade options are completed and discussions will take place between Railtrack, Opraf and the Department of Transport so that we can consider what funding may be necessary to enhance franchising of the route. The franchising director intends to bring forward the franchise for the west coast main line later this year.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) said that the case for privatisation must be made on its merits and he went on to do so extremely well. He mentioned the benefits of fare regulation. Never before have passengers had the assurance that key fares will be pegged to the rate of inflation for three years and then to 1 per cent. below the rate of inflation for the four years thereafter. It is also clear that franchising is good news for passengers, who can see that, far from services being slashed, as our opponents have claimed falsely so many times, they are at least being maintained and in many instances being improved. Of course, franchising is also good news for taxpayers who can see that, for the first five franchises that have now been let, services that required a grant of £300 million to be operated by British Rail will be operated in the seventh year of the franchise for only £95 million. That is good news and it gives the lie to the claims that franchising is an expensive way to deliver rail services—quite the contrary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Keighley also mentioned rolling stock for the Airedale and Wharfedale lines. I hope that he will take comfort from the announcement today about south-eastern trains and the possibility of a franchise term long enough to justify new rolling stock. That shows that, far from privatisation and franchising being incompatible with the provision of new rolling stock, they will facilitate its delivery. I understand that the PTE is working on a replacement options report, which it hopes to have ready by the end of June or in early July. I have agreed to a meeting with the PTE, which I hope my hon. Friend will lead, to discuss any ways in which the Department can help to ensure that the full benefits of the electrification of the line can be obtained.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) entered the realms of fantasy when she claimed that privatisation would cost £2.6 billion. The reality is that the cost to the Government, from the start of the preparation to the end of the past financial year, is £145 million and the cost for British Rail and Railtrack is some £325 million. Against that, we have, so far, sale proceeds in excess of £2.3 billion. To put it another way, the total cost to date of £470 million is represented by only three years of savings on the average subsidy required for the first five franchises.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) said that privatisation of Railtrack will deliver commercial investment funded by the private sector. The Labour alternative, of course, requires more funding through public sector borrowing, from higher fares or from higher taxation. We know that the hon. Member for Ladywood is prepared to pay more in taxes, because she has told us honestly that she is prepared to do that, but that does not run for other Opposition Members, so we must conclude that a Labour Government managing a nationalised railway would not find the funds that Labour Members say are needed to provide adequate investment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley also mentioned access for disabled people. He will recognise that it is difficult to provide access at every station. Unfortunately, earlier generations did not build railway stations with disabled people in mind, but the Rail Regulator requires every train operating company to produce a disabled person's protection policy. The first step towards producing that is an inventory of the existing provision and facilities at stations, and that will be used as a benchmark against which further improvements will be measured.

The position is much brighter when it comes to access to rolling stock. Anglia Trains, Chiltern Railway, CrossCountry, Gatwick, Great Western, InterCity East Coast, InterCity West Coast, Island line, Mersey Rail Electrics and Midland Mainline, for example, are all operating fleets that are entirely accessible to people in wheelchairs. Other operators have mainly wheelchair-accessible rolling stock, even now.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) reminded me of the Government's responsibility, our having been in office for 17 years, to ensure that railways are in a position to operate efficiently and effectively. We accept that responsibility, and we are taking action in the form of the privatisation programme to bring about precisely the improvements in services that everybody recognises should be made.

The hon. Gentleman used the odd term "fragmentation". The network is not fragmented. It was a policy decision that the entire rail network should be owned and managed by Railtrack as an integrated network. Network benefits, such as through ticketing, are all guaranteed by arrangements made by the franchising director and the regulator.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Watts: No. I do not have time to give way to the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, who responded to the debate for the Opposition, overran his time and I must make the best use of mine.

[Mr. Watts]

The hon. Member for Burnley talked about Railtrack asset values. Track access charges are based on replacement values because the purpose of the charges is to ensure that assets can be replaced with their modern equivalents. Fixed assets in the most recent accounts were valued at £4.3 billion. Account must be taken, however, of the company's liabilities. The net assets of Railtrack—assets less liabilities—are only £2.4 billion, not the exaggerated figure of £6.5 billion that Opposition Members are so keen to quote.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day) made some thoughtful observations on railway safety. It is still part of the culture to share experience on safety matters. Some of the so-called leaks on safety that make the Opposition so excited arise only because it is part of the system widely to disseminate information on safety matters within the industry. I particularly welcome my hon. Friend's support for the Government in defeating the Opposition's motion. Like many of my other hon. Friends, and hon. Members representing parties other than the Opposition, my hon. Friend is much too wily to be caught out by squalid little tricks from the Labour party.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): Is this the peroration?

Mr. Watts: No. There is no peroration. I am trying to respond to the many points that have been made in a long debate.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) accused the Government of bad faith over the privatisation and flotation of Railtrack, as did other hon. Members. I shall set the record straight. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), the then Minister for Public Transport, said on 23 February 1993:

"Railtrack will be in the public sector for the foreseeable future".—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 23 February 1993; c.400.]

It is also true that my right hon. Friend said on Lords amendments on 1 November 1993:

"Ultimately we wish to see Railtrack move into the private sector, although we cannot forecast when that will happen."—[Official Report, 1 November 1993; Vol. 231, c. 43.]

Lord Caithness, the then Minister of State, Department of Transport, said in July 1993 that the Government had made it clear that

"Railtrack's existence as a government-owned company will last only until it is feasible to transfer it to the private sector." —[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 July 1993; Vol. 548, c. 354.]

Any accusation of bad faith is totally without foundation.

I call on my right hon. and hon. Friends to defeat the Labour motion for the nonsense that it is and to support the amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 30 (Questions on amendments) and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on the progress that it is making with privatisation, with the franchising in the last three weeks alone of the InterCity East Coast, Gatwick Express and Network South Central lines, offering the prospects of better services and higher investment at less cost to tax-payers; recognises that this demonstrates that the Opposition's attempt to halt privatisation has failed; and looks forward to the flotation of Railtrack in May as a golden opportunity for the railways to gain access to the private finance necessary for investment, and for people to become real stakeholders in the railways, thanks to the Government's policy of wider share ownership.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That the Order [25th March] relating to the Family Law Bill [Lords] shall apply to any sitting day on which the House resolves itself into a Committee on those provisions of the Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House; and proceedings in the said Committee may be taken, though opposed, after Ten o'clock.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

NORTHERN IRELAND (ENTRY TO NEGOTIATIONS, ETC) BILL

Ordered,

That, in respect of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, Etc) Bill, notices of Amendments, new Clauses and new Schedules to be moved in Committee may be accepted by the Clerks at the Table before the Bill has been read a second time.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Gas Supplies (Scotland)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

10.14 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Friday 29 December 1995 was the coldest day in a week of perishing cold weather in Scotland. But when my constituents in Prestonpans, Cockenzie and Port Seton woke up that morning, many of them found that the frost was gripping their bedrooms and kitchens as well as their gardens, because the gas supply to 4,180 households had failed.

It took up to three days to turn the gas on again, so more than 10,000 people in my constituency had a horrible Hogmanay weekend, relying on emergency soup kitchens while the frost burst the water pipes in their homes. There was a similiar failure in the gas supply at Stonehouse in Lanarkshire, and my hon. Friend the Member for Clydesdale (Mr. Hood) may wish to refer to that later in the debate.

This major failure of the gas supply got some attention from the national media, and British Gas's distribution company, TransCo, had to bring in 150 engineers from as far away as Brighton and Cornwall to reinstate our local gas supply in East Lothian. I would like to express my constituents' thanks to those engineers, who did a good job in difficult circumstances when I am sure that they would have preferred to be spending the holiday week with their families at home.

Three months later, the Director General of Gas Supply published the findings of the Ofgas inquiry into this incident. I am sorry to say that the Ofgas report has whitewashed the minor points and missed the main points altogether. The main point surely is that the circumstances were not unpredictable, so the failure of the gas supply should not have been allowed to happen. I am not satisfied that my constituents' experiences have been taken seriously, and I fear that similar failures will occur elsewhere in the future if we do not take steps to impose better standards on this highly profitable privatised industry. That is why I am raising this matter in the House.

I will give a brief summary of the events in Prestonpans, Cockenzie and Port Seton at the end of December. As I have said, the weather was extremely cold. In Edinburgh, the temperature dropped to minus 8 deg C on Wednesday 27th, minus 12 deg C on Thursday, minus 13 deg C on Friday and minus 14 deg C on Saturday 30 December. But it was several degrees colder in other parts of Scotland. Both Glasgow and Aberdeen experienced temperatures of minus 20 deg C during that week.

Evidently the main gas supply into that part of my constituency was not big enough to meet the morning and evening peak demands when people were heating their homes and cooking meals. There is a gasholder at Preston Links that fills up when demand is low, to boost the local supply at times of peak demand. The gasholder is checked regularly, and on 27 December it had 20 per cent. less gas than it should have had, and the pressure in the system was low.

If TransCo had been paying any attention to the weather forecast, it would have realised that things were going to get worse, and it should have taken steps to avoid the crisis that followed. But it did nothing. On the night of the 28th, the gasholder stock ran out, the incoming supply could not keep up with the demand for gas and the pressure in the system fell dangerously low, so all the gas customers in the area—4,180 households, more than 10,000 people—were cut off early in the morning of 29 December.

The gas supply system had collapsed, and it was in a dangerous condition because air could have been drawn into the supply pipes. So it was necessary to isolate street sections, check each householder's gas installation and bleed off the air in the system before restoring the gas supply. That was a major task, involving 150 engineers, including 100 who came up from England. Some households got their gas supplies restored within 24 hours, but the unluckier ones had to wait for up to three days in very cold weather.

East Lothian district council and Lothian regional council, together with the police and emergency services, had to go into action to provide support for elderly and disabled people, and to set up emergency reception centres and catering in the two local community centres. British Gas used its GasCare register to help to identify those most at risk, and information was provided through an emergency telephone service and the local media. TransCo helpfully distributed hundreds of electric heaters, but it was not altogether surprising that the resulting surge in demand for electricity in one street led to a temporary failure in the electricity supply, as if things were not bad enough already.

I kept in close touch with the situation, and I was advised that the official standards of service for the gas industry would require the payment of compensation of £20 a day to affected householders. But of course, at that stage, everyone was rightly concentrating on the main objective of restoring the gas supply, which was eventually completed just in time for Hogmanay. There were still burst waterpipes to repair on 1 January as people began to count their costs, and TransCo started looking for excuses.

TransCo rightly recognised the risk of a public relations disaster if it were to try to sidestep its liability to pay compensation. So it offered the two local community councils the princely sum of £1,000 each. It has not offered to contribute towards the substantial costs incurred by the local authorities—which I understand run into tens of thousands of pounds—but it did make the appropriate £20-a-day payments to affected householders "as a good will gesture". It stipulated that it was an ex gratia payment rather than fulfilment of any obligation, let alone an admission of liability. That bothers me, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

TransCo has claimed that the failure of the supply was due to exceptional circumstances under its contractual standards of service, and that the company was under no obligation to maintain the supply or to pay any compensation. Amazingly, Ofgas has now endorsed that interpretation, and I put it to the Minister that those standards of service must be amended to avoid the risk of similar failures in cold weather in the future.

Key standard 6 in British Gas's standards of service stipulates criteria for continuity of supply with an exception for "interruptions caused by circumstances beyond the Company's control where restoration of the supply within 24 hours is impossible due to exceptional circumstances".

[Mr. John Home Robertson]

Ofgas has defined "exceptional circumstances" as anything with less than a one in 20 chance of occurring, which means that British Gas can avoid responsibility for any supply failure in Scotland if the effective temperature falls below minus 6 deg C. That calculation in this instance was made on a national basis, with bizarre consequences: the lower temperature in Glasgow and Aberdeen, where the supply did not fail, has been used to help to justify the cut-off in East Lothian, where the weather was less severe.

As things stand, it appears that, if the weather gets very cold, and if there is more than a marginal increase in customer demand for gas—just 12 per cent. in the case of East Lothian in December—this massively profitable privatised utility has no contractual obligation to keep the gas flowing. The company will go on paying Cedric Brown's £247,000 pension and Richard Giordano's £450,000 salary plus perks, but the poor old customers can freeze as far as it is concerned.

I suggest a variation to the proverb: if you can't stand the cold, don't use gas in your kitchen. As climatic change seems to be leading to colder winters, Ofgas's one in 20 criterion is probably out of date. Do we seriously believe that it will be 80 years before the weather gets as cold as it was last winter? I do not think so.

The experience of my constituents makes it painfully clear that British Gas must be required to upgrade inadequate parts of the supply network or face penalties if things go wrong. There are other areas with potentially dodgy supplies that depend on gasholders, including parts of Glasgow.

The crisis should have been predictable. TransCo knew the limitations of the local supply system and knew that British Gas had taken on a lot of new domestic customers in new housing developments in the area. A total of 441 new houses have been built in the Prestonpans, Cockenzie and Port Seton area since 1990—almost all of them with gas central heating.

We now know that TransCo had plans to upgrade the supply and to do away with the Preston Links gasholder. I hope that the Minister will be able to assure me that the work will be completed before next winter, but I am afraid that the gasholder is still there—I saw it on Monday. The margin between capacity and possible demand should never have been so finely balanced in the first place.

Paragraph 4.2 of the Ofgas report, under the heading "Action to Prevent a Recurrence", makes a significant tacit acknowledgement that all is not well in the system. It states:

"TransCo Districts have been asked to undertake further planning and load sensitivity studies to consider whether any additional opportunities might exist to alleviate supply difficulties in periods of extreme temperatures at the limit of the system design criteria."

It will take more than studies—we need assurances that the necessary work will be funded and carried out. It is imperative that the national criteria for the supply system be amended to guarantee the requirements of customers at times of greatest need; otherwise, it is quite possible that whole cities could be cut off as my constituents were last December

No doubt British Gas and other commercial gas suppliers will be reluctant to pay their share of the cost of upgrading TransCo's pipeline network. However, Ofgas must surely have an overriding duty to protect customers' interests by stipulating proper criteria for security of supply to avoid this kind of breakdown. Ofgas has seen fit to make excuses and to quote escape clauses for the failure of the supply in East Lothian last December. It is up to the Minister and the House to tell the Director General of Gas Supply to put public interests before the commercial interests of gas suppliers in the future.

The risk of supply failures can and should be minimised—that is the important point that the Minister must address. However, it will never be possible to eliminate the risk altogether. We must have the best possible contingency plans and systems to provide for the needs of elderly, disabled and vulnerable people in the event of a gas cut. The GasCare system seems to have worked reasonably well in this case, although I understand that the register is far from complete.

I am told that up to 1 million eligible customers are not registered under the current set-up. I gather that the threatened diversification of domestic gas suppliers could play havoc with TransCo's GasCare database in the future. I am advised that the register will show only the account number and address of elderly and disabled customers, so it will be a complicated task to find their names and telephone numbers in order to provide support and advice in an emergency, such as the one that occurred in December. The Government are promoting this market madness, so is it too much to ask the Minister to take account of the consequences for vulnerable people?

In conclusion, I inform the Minister that a large number of my constituents are very angry about the failure of their gas supply last December, and they have not been impressed by the dodging and weaving of British Gas, TransCo and Ofgas in the aftermath of that failure. I am grateful to Prestonpans community council, Cockenzie and Port Seton community council, the local members of the East Lothian and Lothian councils and Mr. Euan Robson of the Scottish Gas Consumers Council for making representations on behalf of gas customers. People are entitled to expect appropriate action, especially in East Lothian and other parts of the country where the system may be risky.

The clear conclusion is that this sort of predictable and avoidable gas supply failure must not be allowed to happen again in East Lothian or anywhere else. Effective contractual safeguards must be set and enforced. When I wrote to the Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy in January, he replied:

"it is important to know why it happened and what lessons can be learned", and said that these were matters for the Director General of Gas Supply.

Sadly, Ofgas has whitewashed the incident and fudged the lessons, so I put it to the Minister that he has a duty to intervene to set proper standards for the gas supply industry.

10.29 pm

The Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): I am grateful to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) for raising this important subject. Although the hour is late and springtime is arriving, it is right that we should have an opportunity to discuss this subject. I pay tribute to the great interest that he has taken in representing his constituents, and express my appreciation to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, for joining me tonight.

Mr. Home Robertson: He is a constituent of mine.

Mr. Page: I am delighted that he is, and I sincerely hope that my hon. Friend did not have his gas cut off just after Christmas.

It might help the hon. Gentleman if I explained for the record how gas supply security has been approached by British Gas, and the standard licence conditions set by the President of the Board of Trade under the Gas Act 1995.

There are two principal aspects to security of gas supplies. The first is to secure that each winter there is sufficient gas to meet demand. That is achieved by means of the network code, which provides the economic incentives for gas shippers and suppliers to obtain sufficient gas and the price signals that can trigger demand by larger users. Further flexibility arises where gas is conveyed on interruptible terms to large industrial consumers, allowing the suspension of supply where needed. Those arrangements are together designed to secure that sufficient gas is available to domestic customers to meet the demand that would arise in one winter in 50.

The second aspect of supply security is ensuring that there is sufficient pipeline capacity to get the gas to where it is needed. That is a more complicated task, because it involves the operation of each part of the gas pipeline network in Great Britain, which runs to a staggering 0.25 million km of pipes. The criterion is that the system must be designed to meet the demand occurring on the peak day likely to occur in one winter in 20. The hon. Gentleman referred to his concern about that limit.

Those security criteria have been used for the planning and development of the gas network, and were reviewed by British Gas in the context of the 1993 Monopolies and Mergers Commission report. They have now been enshrined as specific regulatory obligations in the new licences.

On the specific incident, let me again say, as I have already said at Question Time, how sorry I was to hear about the supply failure that affected part of the hon. Gentleman's constituency during what he admitted was exceptionally severe weather last December. Whether we are, as he suggested, entering another ice age is a matter for debate. I stress the word "exceptionally". I understand that the nearest monitoring station, the Royal Botanic Garden in Edinburgh, recorded the coldest temperatures since records began there. The hon. Gentleman emphasised that it was exceptional.

It is an example of Murphy's law, and an undesirable fact of life, that many of the services upon which we depend are prone to break down just when we need them the most, because that is when they are placed under the greatest stress. In fact, the gas distribution system is highly resilient, and hardly ever breaks down through excess demand. That it did on this occasion was a consequence of prolonged very bad weather combined with higher than usual residential demand due to the Christmas and new year holiday.

At this stage—I think that the hon. Gentleman has endorsed this—I should like to acknowledge the great efforts made by those working in the gas industry and the local authority to minimise the disruption and inconvenience caused. I pay tribute to the way in which the people affected in both East Lothian and Lanarkshire coped with the incidents.

As the hon. Gentleman is aware, high demand caused the supply disruption during the extremely cold weather. I thought that he might be interested to note that demand was 121 per cent. more than the demand for an average winter day, which is more than double. The local supply system, despite being built to the required standard, was sadly unable to cope with that unprecedented demand due to that operational constraint, which is already being removed. As the hon. Gentleman said, there was a risk of air getting in and a danger to the system, which had to be shut down for safety reasons. I understand that emergency plans and procedures, including those involving the local agencies, were duly implemented.

Just over 4,000 homes were cut off in East Lothian on Friday 29 December, and 500 had their supplies restored the same day. As the hon. Gentleman said, engineers were called from the length and breadth of the United Kingdom, and worked ceaselessly and tirelessly to try to restore supplies. That process of restoring supplies required a visit to every house by a gas engineer. I believe that some of the delays were caused by the difficulty of getting access to some of the houses, which is why it took three days to reconnect some. As it happened, by Saturday 30 December most of the supplies were restored because those 100-plus engineers worked around the clock.

Both TransCo and Scottish Gas made strenuous efforts to help those customers who suffered disruption to their supplies. They paid particular attention to those with special needs, such as the elderly. As the hon. Gentleman no doubt knows, an incident room was set up in a local primary school to co-ordinate welfare provision and the restoration of supplies.

In particular, British Gas liaised with the regional council to arrange food and warmth in community centres, town halls and schools. It provided several hundred electric heaters and cookers for those in greatest need, and supplied pre-paid power cards for distribution to pensioners and people on income support. Scottish Gas provided a 24-hour help line, and also made contact with those on the GasCare register—the record of customers who have notified British Gas of their age or special needs—to check that they had adequate heating and cooking.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): The Minister emphasised that the Lothian region performed extremely well, and so it did, but Lothian region is no more, thanks to the crazy local government reorganisation. It is far from clear that in West Lothian, East Lothian or Midlothian one, would get the same service if the situation were ever to arise again.

Mr. Page: This is not quite the opportunity to debate the reorganisation of Scottish local authority activities.

Mr. Dalyell: The hon. Gentleman mentioned it.

Mr. Page: Although I said that Lothian coped well, I am confident that its successors will have equally adequate support systems in place if such a disaster ever occurs again.

TransCo's efforts to keep consumers informed about the situation—including about 80 media updates and door-to-door calls—have been criticised. TransCo is considering how improvements in those procedures can be made. I will ensure that the comments of the hon. Member for East Lothian about having a register and the security of the register for the most vulnerable are drawn to the attention of British Gas, so that it can take those concerns into account.

Unlike the hon. Member for East Lothian, I am grateful to the Director-General of Gas Supply for the thorough investigation that her office has undertaken into the incident in East Lothian. I do not so casually dismiss the work that she has done on the investigation. It has provided a basis of factual material that has certainly helped me to prepare for this debate.

I understand that some of the hon Member's constituents believed that the interruption to their supplies was due to the diversion of supplies to Edinburgh. The Ofgas investigation paid particular attention to that concern, but concluded that the interruption arose from the demands placed on the local supply system, and not as a result of deliberate demand management by TransCo.

Mr. Home Robertson: I realise that the Minister has been well briefed for the debate, but I did not raise that issue, precisely because I am satisfied with the explanation given by Ofgas. What I said was that the criterion to which the Minister has referred—the one-in-20 criterion—is plainly insufficient. If that criterion is taken as an acceptable baseline, it means that all of us will experience two or perhaps three complete shutdowns of the gas supply in our houses in our lifetime. That is not tolerable. It is up to the Minister and Ofgas to impose realistic criteria to ensure genuine safety of supply in cold winters.

Mr. Page: Time is not on my side. I do not have enough to argue the point back and forth, but, if I recall correctly—I shall read the report of our proceedings—the hon. Gentleman used words such as "whitewash" in relation to the report. That is slightly dismissive. He says that the one-in-20 criterion is not adequate, but, apart from a small shutdown in Lanarkshire, the details of which I am not completely au fait with, the incident in East Lothian was the only one that I am aware has occurred in the past 10 years.

Mr. Home Robertson: So that is all right, then?

Mr. Page: I did not say that it was all right. As the hon. Gentleman is saying that there will be two or three such incidents in the next year or so, I have to point out that, in the past 10 years at least, there has been only the one incident. It must not be blown out of all proportion. If the hon. Gentleman can contain his enthusiasm, I hope that I shall be able to bring him some comfort for the future.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question, which was mentioned in the Ofgas report, of the monitoring of the gasholder at Prestonpans. It will, of course, become an academic question for this site when TransCo completes the current re-enforcement, which will connect the area directly to the higher capacity intermediate pressure system. However, the director general suggested improved inspection, and I understand that TransCo has now decided that, where a gasholder is critical to security of supply, it will be visited more frequently when conditions approach that one-in-20 situation.

I must emphasis that, although the failure was in freak conditions that well surpassed the design criteria, I would not wish it to be thought that TransCo is simply shrugging off the whole issue. Steps are being taken to ensure that such incidents remain exceedingly rare.

In the specific location, the operational constraint that caused the problem—the medium pressure link to the local area—is being replaced with an intermediate pressure link with a much higher capacity. That will effectively rule out a repetition of the incident, and is due to be installed in time for next winter. A stretch of pipeline 1.25 km long has already been installed. I shall ensure that TransCo is aware of the concerns that the hon. Gentleman has expressed, and of the need to ensure that the work is completed before next winter.

More generally, TransCo is considering its response to the recommendations of the Ofgas investigation. However, it is already undertaking further planning and load sensitivity studies to ascertain whether additional opportunities may exist to alleviate supply difficulties in periods of extreme temperature at the limits of the system design criteria. Also, I understand that the Edinburgh district is compiling a report detailing the procedures used throughout the incident, highlighting the learning points from its experience. The report will be distributed to other districts, and any learning points will be incorporated in emergency plans as appropriate. I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

As I said at the outset, I appreciate the concerns raised by the hon. Gentleman on behalf of his constituents, but I hope that what I have said this evening will provide some reassurance for the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

Taxation

1. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much tax revenue has changed since 1990. [24303]

The Paymaster General (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): Receipts of taxes by Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise were £174 billion in 1995-96 compared with £138 billion in 1990-91.

Mr. Pawsey: That answer underlines, if nothing else, the substantial improvement to the United Kingdom economy over the past six years, an improvement that has been fuelled by low inflation and low interest rates, which in turn have reduced unemployment substantially. Will my right hon. Friend reject any appeals to increase taxation to ensure that he is not taken short?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. We have an almost uniquely favourable set of economic circumstances at present, including low inflation, steady growth and falling unemployment. We have recently cut income tax. We have no policies from Opposition Front Benchers on Treasury matters, but we have a hint from the Opposition spokesman on transport. My hon. Friend was probably referring to that. We all know that Labour Governments increase taxes. If the Opposition Treasury team does not know that, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) obviously does.

Dr. Bray: Will the Minister say whether the receipts from value added tax, being lower in the outturn than they were in the Budget forecasts over a period of years, are due to errors in forecasting or to failures in the collection of VAT? If so, what remedial measures are the Government taking?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Actually, the VAT receipts for the year just ended, 1995-96, have come in very slightly under the Budget forecast made last November, but considerably under the forecasts made a year before that. The reason for that is not clear. If there has been an increase in avoidance schemes, that will be actively investigated by the Treasury. In the Finance Bill, which has just completed its passage through the House, we put a stop to a large potential avoidance scheme to prevent any erosion of the VAT tax base.

Mr. Michael Brown: I hope that my right hon. Friend will not be too hard on the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short). Should we not congratulate the hon. Lady on at least being the authentic voice of the real Labour party? Will my right hon. Friend take it from me that most of us regard her as the real voice of the Labour party, whose voice would ultimately be heard if the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) were ever to be Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I agree with my hon. Friend. The hon. Lady has been hauled up and silenced for speaking the truth about Labour tax plans.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Is not the truth of the matter that the Paymaster General and his right hon. and hon. Friends have a right nerve talking about tax when it is they who are in breach of all their general election promises? They increased taxes, costing a typical family £800 extra last year. Is it not the reality that, despite those increases and impositions, tax revenues have not increased as quickly as the Government predicted, landing the United Kingdom with a £32 billion bonanza public sector borrowing requirement? That proves that, just as the public cannot trust the Tories on tax and living standards, they cannot trust them on public borrowing either.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There is still no indication from the Opposition Front-Bench team of its tax plans. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we have cut and are cutting taxes. This month, wage earners and salary earners will see a further cut in their standard rate of income tax. A quarter of all taxpayers are now paying tax at only 20 per cent.

I remind the hon. Gentleman also that, when the Conservative party took office in 1979, the standard rate of corporation tax was 52 per cent.; we brought it down to 33 per cent. Small company corporation tax stood at 40 per cent., which we have reduced to 24 per cent.

Interest Rates

2. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on current levels of interest rates. [24305]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I cut base rates by a ¼ per cent. to 6 per cent. on 8 March. That cut in rates was the third in four months, and was based on the improved outlook for inflation.

Mr. Winterton: When my right hon. and learned Friend visits Macclesfield tomorrow, a borough whose Conservative-controlled council manages its affairs as prudently as he seeks to run the national affairs, will he listen to the views of local business men and women, whose views I share, who believe that low interest rates and low inflation are essential to the future success of our country? Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept from me that, although there has been a modest improvement in the housing market, a further improvement, which would also enhance the opportunity of the Conservative party being re-elected at the next election, would be gratefully assisted if he were able to reduce interest rates by a further ½ a per cent. as soon as possible?

Mr. Clarke: I am looking forward to hearing the views of the business people of Macclesfield tomorrow, as they are usually so forcefully put by my hon. Friend. As he will know, Britain has the lowest interest rates—the best run on interest rates—that we have seen for 50 years or so. Business expects to see a combination of low interest rates based on sound management of the public finances and low inflation. The combination of circumstances that we have now produced is the best of that kind that we have seen for a long time.

The housing market is beginning to show the first encouraging signs of some improvement. It is—I agree with my hon. Friend—small at the moment, but it is encouraging that house prices are beginning to go up and that turnover appears to be improving. I trust that, if we keep the present conditions in place, housing and construction will recover and begin to enjoy the increased prosperity that other sectors of the economy are obviously now feeling quite strongly.

Mr. Sheldon: Is the Chancellor aware that one of the few encouraging aspects of his chancellorship has been that he has been winning the battle with the Governor of the Bank of England? Given the extremely high level of the public sector borrowing requirement, will he adopt an even more robust attitude in his meetings with the Governor to ensure that interest rates do not rise?

Mr. Clarke: The Governor and I are joined in battle, side by side, to achieve the Government's inflation target—which we plainly will achieve—of 2½ per cent. It is that which is giving Britain the best inflation record that it has had for a generation and more, and it is that which is making the present recovery so strong and likely to be sustained.

The Labour party cannot even say what inflation target it would set if ever it got into government, and that is because the whole history of Labour Governments, including the one in which the right hon. Gentleman served, has been one of taking inflation through the roof—which has been destructive of all industrial recoveries in recent times.

Lady Olga Maitland: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, with the lowest mortgage rates in 31 years, the property market in my constituency in Sutton is undoubtedly shifting and, with that, the morale of property owners is going up? Is that not good news for his policies?

Mr. Clarke: It is very good for the people in my hon. Friend's constituency and in mine, and throughout the rest of the country. I am extremely glad that the number of people suffering from negative equity is now plainly on a downward path, but I am sure that my hon. Friend and I are both agreed that that must continue. Those are the encouraging signs for the housing industry, but it needs years of this, and years of this means sticking with the policies of this Government and avoiding the danger of a party that does not even have a target for such things ever coming to power.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

3. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate for the PSBR for the rest of 1996; and if he will make a statement. [24307]

6. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the change in the level of Government borrowing over the last financial year. [24313]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. William Waldegrave): The provisional outturn for the 1995-96 PSBR is £32 billion. Excluding privatisation proceeds, that is £8 billion lower than the previous year.

An updated forecast of the 1996-97 PSBR will be published in the summer economic forecast in a couple of months' time.

Mr. MacShane: Is not that answer proof positive not just of the ideological disarray on the Treasury Benches but of technical incompetence? In the Red Book for 1995-96 we were promised a PSBR for this year of £21 billion, yet in the press release issued today that has increased to £32 billion. The Treasury was not able to account for £10 billion, which now has to be found. If any company were responsible for that, its finance directors would be sacked. I suggest to the Chief Secretary that perhaps Sir Richard Scott should be asked to set up an inquiry into where that money has gone.

Mr. Waldegrave: The expenditure controls have come in exactly on target yet again. For every year in which we set a new control total, we have hit it exactly. I do not think that there was any year under the previous Labour Government, except when the International Monetary Fund was running things, of which that could be said.

The Labour party has voted against every one of the expenditure control measures that we have taken. It has voted against them, lobbied against them and gone into the outside world and argued against them. Under Labour party policies, and under what it would have done if Labour had been in power, borrowing would have been much higher, as it would be if ever Labour got to power.

Mr. Mitchell: Is the Minister aware that, as a proportion of gross domestic product, the national debt is now more than 50 per cent., which is about the same as it was in 1979-80, despite the fact that he has had more than £100 billion of revenue from North sea oil, plus all the revenue from privatisation? This year's PSBR will cost about £3 billion, and every year into the future, just to pay the interest on it. That is accumulating deadweight debt. Is that responsible finance?

Mr. Waldegrave: It is extremely helpful to have support for Conservative economic policies from anywhere in the House and it is wonderful to hear Opposition Members arguing in favour of lower spending, lower debt and lower taxes. The trouble, however, is that we all know that that is wonderland. If the Labour party came into power, it would be just like it was when Labour was in power before: higher borrowing, higher taxes, higher spending—and I am advised that the hon. Gentleman has his tie on upside down.

Sir Peter Hordern: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important to keep the PSBR as low as possible to keep interest rates low, otherwise it would be impossible to have tax cuts, but is it not pretty rich for the Opposition to talk about the PSBR when, as a proportion of GDP, the PSBR was so high under Labour that the Labour party collapsed into the arms of the IMF on two occasions?

Mr. Waldegrave: I agree with my right hon. Friend. He is clearly right. Many people are asking—many supporters of the Labour party are asking—what on earth is the point of a party of, allegedly, the left that argues the same case as the Conservatives? Where has the dialectic of politics gone? The truth is that it has not gone at all. If the Labour party ever got back into power, we would have higher spending, higher borrowing, higher taxes, as we always do under a Labour Government, and higher unemployment, too. There has never been a Labour Government who did not leave unemployment higher than they found it.

Mr. Legg: Will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on the progress that he has made in reducing the PSBR over recent years? Is he aware, however, that if Britain were part of a single currency, the current deficit would be unacceptable, the United Kingdom would be subject to fines, and the timing of tax increases and public expenditure reductions would no longer be a matter for the Chancellor and the approval of the House? Does he accept that such a reduction in the powers of Her Majesty's Ministers and the authority of the House would be unacceptable?

Mr. Waldegrave: We are doing what we believe to be right for this country, and we would be doing it in any circumstances and shall continue to do it. It is noticeable that the debt to GDP ratio in the United Kingdom has fallen since 1979, whereas it has up to doubled in the other big countries of the EU. The sensible policies followed by the Conservative Government over the past years, which will be continued whatever happens, seem to me to stand on their own merits.

Sir James Molyneaux: Will the Chief Secretary consider recommending raising the retirement age and thus make a big contribution to reducing the public debt?

Mr. Waldegrave: The right hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point—which, incidentally, is referred to in the IMF world report which was published today. That report reveals the long-term strength of the United Kingdom's position, thanks to our funded pensions. We have almost no "contribution gap"—if I may use the jargon—whereas a number of other countries, especially those that follow the Opposition's policies of implementing the social charter and high social spending, among others, now face severe difficulties.

Mr. Gallie: Will my right hon. Friend tell us how important the recent successes of the car industry have been in dealing with the continuing pressures on the public sector borrowing requirement? Following the words of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), will he also tell us what effect such ideas, if implemented, would have on car ownership?

Mr. Waldegrave: We seem to have witnessed the shortest ever half-life of a Labour policy. Yesterday, a policy relating to punitive taxation of company cars was leaked; it has already been withdrawn today, in the Evening Standard.

My hon. Friend makes a good point. We are now a major car manufacturing and exporting country again: we are exporting and producing as many cars as we were in the early 1970s. The proposals advanced by Labour's transport spokesman would damage that position.

Mr. Charles Kennedy: In an interview with Sir David Frost in September 1994, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that a public sector borrowing requirement of £30 billion was no basis for cutting taxes. Where does that leave the Government's tax-cutting strategy today, given that we now have a PSBR of £32.2 billion? Has the Chancellor abandoned his previous position, or has the Government's strategy collapsed?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is labouring under a misapprehension. The figure that has just been reported relates to the last year; the taxes that we have introduced will affect next year.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Would not the PSBR forecast for this year have been much lower without the costs of the bovine spongiform encephalopathy scare, stoked up so disgracefully by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman)?

Mr. Waldegrave: I suspect that my hon. Friend is right. [Interruption.] Opposition Members laugh; they are laughing at the damaging of livelihoods by the scares caused largely by Labour's health spokesman, which I do not consider a laughing matter.

Public Spending Targets

4. Dr. Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to review his public spending targets. [24309]

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's objective for public spending is to reduce it as a share of gross domestic product over time, and in particular to reduce it to below 40 per cent. The last Budget set out plans to achieve that in 1997-98. If we can go further than 40 per cent. we will, and the target is constantly reviewed.

Dr. Wright: Is the Chief Secretary aware that Opposition Members follow the Chancellor's predictions with considerable interest? We particularly enjoyed his recent prediction that, because the electors of South-East Staffordshire now felt so good about the Government's economic policies, they would show their appreciation in the usual way. In view of the current state of the Chancellor's predictions on both growth and borrowing, is it not the case that he will be able to deliver a pre-election tax bribe only at the expense of public spending cuts of a savagery that he personally would find unacceptable? Although Opposition Members might understand that, has the Chancellor the slightest chance of explaining it to the ideological warriors seated behind him?

Mr. Waldegrave: We do not follow either the predictions or the opinions of Opposition Front Benchers with much interest, because they have no predictions or opinions. That is one of the problems of debating economics in the House. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has delivered an economy that is working more strongly and stably than, perhaps, at any point in my lifetime, and I think that he and the House should be proud of that.

Mr. John Marshall: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer. It will be warmly welcomed by most people, who realise that lower taxes will come only from lower Government expenditure. Would not public expenditure soar under a Government whose members approached every problem with a blank cheque?

Mr. Waldegrave: We have hit our spending targets in each of the past four years, although they have been tough, and I intend to ensure that we hit them again this year. I do not think that any serious economic commentator believes that Labour could keep spending at the levels that we have planned, but we will do so.

Taxation

5. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the public on current levels of taxation. [24312]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mrs. Angela Knight): My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has received a number of representations on current levels of taxation, including some from residents of Plymouth welcoming the tax cuts made in his November Budget.

Mr. Jamieson: Can the Minister confirm that, by the end of this financial year, a typical family, even in Plymouth, will have paid £2,000 more in taxes since the general election? Will she also confirm that she supported those 22 tax rises which have confirmed that the Tories are instinctively a party of higher taxation?

Mrs. Knight: I will confirm that, as a consequence of the November Budget, tax changes are worth £190 this year to couples with children. The improvement in the economy means that they are likely to be £450 better off and, since 1979, they are £4,500 better off. That is our record. When the hon. Gentleman's party was in power from 1974 to 1979, people were better off by only £80. They are £4,500 better off under the Conservatives.

Mr. John Townend: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the Government intend to have plenty of clear water between themselves and the Opposition on taxation policy? I urge the Government to cut spending so that they can safely continue to cut taxes and make it clear to voters at the next election that we are still the party of low taxation and Labour is the party of high taxation.

Mrs. Knight: I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall be prudent in everything we do. We are aware that successful countries are those that tax less and spend less, and we propose to make this a successful country. I can also assure him that a recent survey of 600 executives concluded that most of them forecast higher taxes, greater unemployment, a diminished international standing and a resurgence of the left if Labour came to power. The Opposition are not fooling people, I am glad to say.

Mr. Darling: Can the Economic Secretary confirm that a typical family is now paying a higher effective rate of tax than it did in 1979, and that the only Tory instinct on taxation is to mislead and distort? Far from getting a tax bonanza, as the chairman of the Tory party claimed today, Britain is getting a tax nightmare for millions, and that nightmare is about to be experienced by rather a large number of the Minister's colleagues.

Mrs. Knight: I can confirm that we have the lowest basic rate of tax for over 50 years, that people will be better off this year as a result of the combination of the Budget and the improving economy and that people are substantially better off since 1979. When Labour had its chance, it crucified people and companies with taxes. That is why people left the country and why businesses were doing so badly. Under us they are not doing that: they are doing well.

Film Industry

7. Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures have been introduced by Her Majesty's Treasury since May 1979 to assist the British film industry; and if he will make a statement. [24315]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Jack): Before 1979, there were no special tax rules for the film industry. Since then, the Government have provided a number of special tax concessions to help the industry.

Sir Michael Shersby: Does my hon. Friend agree that since 1979 the Conservative party has been the true friend of the British film industry? Will he remind the House of some of those tax policies, such as income matching, and of the economic policies that have helped one of our most successful industries to prosper?

Mr. Jack: My hon. Friend speaks with considerable knowledge because of his involvement in the film industry. He is right to underscore the fact that, as I said in my answer, before 1979 there was no special tax help for the industry. Now the system of income matching, which we introduced, means that tax relief of up to £80 million a year is given to the industry. My hon. Friend may care to note a point in addition to tax, that Mr. Tony Scott, who recently bought Shepperton studios, told Barry Norman's "Film 96" that one of the reasons he made "Judge Dredd" in this country was that production costs were some 33 per cent. lower than in America. Goodness knows what that would be if Labour implemented the social chapter.

Taxation

8. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for tax reductions; and if he will make a statement. [24316]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are committed to making further progress towards a 20p basic rate of tax when it is right for the economy to do so.

Mr. Mullin: We know that the Chancellor comes from the civilised wing of his party—possibly the Chief Secretary does as well. Does the Chancellor agree that it would be wholly irresponsible to attempt to purchase the result of the next general election with tax cuts? Will he take this opportunity to make that clear to his hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend), his right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) and their mean-minded friends on the Benches behind him?

Mr. Clarke: I confirm that it would be wholly wrong to attempt to buy the next election by irresponsible tax cuts, and we have no intention of doing so. We aim to lower taxation as part of our policy of producing a strong industrial economy. The hon. Gentleman comes from the civilised wing of his party, as does the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short)—that section of the Labour party that believes in higher taxation, higher expenditure and higher public borrowing. Those hon. Members would revert to such a system if the present Labour Front Benchers—who are completely vacuous and empty on all these subjects in public—ever took Labour back into power.

Mr. Budgen: Has my right hon. and learned Friend received any advice recently from one of the most distinguished Labour statesmen, Lord Healey, who said in 1977 that he intended to squeeze the rich until the pips squeaked?

Mr. Clarke: I have not recently had his advice but, like my hon. Friend, I well recollect the experience of having Lord Healey as Chancellor, when the top rate of tax on earned income was 83 per cent. In addition, by taking the public sector borrowing requirement as a proportion of gross domestic product to 7 per cent., Labour was really deferring yet more taxation which would have come in had the Conservatives not taken office in 1979. We must avoid, above all else, a repeat of that experience.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Given that any statements that the Chancellor makes about tax and borrowing have been about as accurate as his forecast of a Conservative election victory in South-East Staffordshire, and given that the forecasts of public borrowing in the Conservative Budget at the previous election have been exceeded over the past four years by £46 billion—forecasts that were used to justify tax cuts that could not be sustained—does the Chancellor therefore now agree that his borrowing forecast for November should be subject to an independent audit by people outside the Treasury so that the Conservative party can never mislead the people of this country about tax and borrowing again?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman advised his party not to vote against the tax cuts that I was able to introduce in the last Budget, one of the few wise decisions—indeed, one of the few decisions of any kind—that he has taken since he started shadowing me. The borrowing forecast for next year will be below the £30 billion that the Liberal Democrat spokesman—[Interruption.] I know of no one who believes that it will be above £30 billion. It is clear that our borrowing requirement is on a downward path towards balance in the medium term, and that is the foundation of our policy. I forecast that we would move towards balance in the medium term, that we would move towards an inflation rate of 2½ per cent. and that we would make progress towards a 20 per cent. basic rate—all that is coming true, as is my forecast that we would have the strongest economic recovery in western Europe. The hon. Gentleman's history of forecasts used to be dreadful, when he made any, but he has not made one for a year or two.

Mr. Duncan Smith: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the real debate is about whether the Government agree to what degree, how much and when we reduce taxation, as opposed to the Opposition, who wonder to what degree they can resist raising taxation? In line with that, has he received any quiet submissions from anybody in Birmingham, Ladywood?

Mr. Clarke: We know that tax reductions go in line with the proper control of public spending and that tax reductions have to be seen as part of an overall policy of creating a healthy enterprise economy. That is a clear and consistent policy that is producing results. I have received no representations from any Opposition Member, and it would be hopeless to expect any comment from Labour Front Benchers. I look forward to a reshuffle of shadow posts, because the shadow Secretary of State for Transport obviously has views on the subject—they lie in a tax-raising direction. Perhaps the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) might have to devote himself to roads and tramways for a year or two to come.

Finance Bill

9. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the Finance Bill on job security. [24317]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Government policy is to promote a climate for high living standards and employment growth. Yesterday's unemployment figures, which showed a fall of 25,700, demonstrate our success in achieving this. The Finance Bill contributes to job security because it allows people in work to keep more of what they earn and lowers the tax burden on employers.

Mr. Cunningham: Will the Minister confirm that 42 per cent. of those in employment are in temporary jobs and, at the same time, that the number of permanent jobs is dropping?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: There is nothing shameful about part-time work. The labour force survey shows that the great majority of those in part-time work like it because it suits their lives and because, very often, they are bringing up children. The hon. Gentleman, who clearly believes that the only real job is full-time, permanent, male employment in a heavy industry, has been overtaken by modern patterns of employment. The important thing is that we have more people in work than any other major European country and that unemployment has been falling year after year.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: Does my right hon. Friend agree that what most improves job security is to see unemployment go down by 800,000, as it has over the past two years, decreasing by 25,000 in the last month alone? Has he noticed the recent report of the independent Employment Policy Institute, which stated that the minimum wage would wreck job prospects in the economy as a whole and would have an unduly bad effect on smaller companies, which account for the vast majority of job creation?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend is quite right. The first security that people look for is a job and we are providing those jobs. The second security comes from keeping more of what they earn and save, and we are providing that too. On the issue of over-regulation and red tape costing employment, the evidence is here for all to see. Unemployment is falling in this country, but it is going up in European countries that have an over-rigid labour market.

Ms Primarolo: Does the Minister agree that security is also based on a belief that one will keep one's job and that half the work force now feel insecure in their job? Like the electorate in South-East Staffordshire, they do not believe the Government when they say that the economy is coming right. Can the Minister explain why those workers continue to feel insecure and what impact it is having on the economy?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have explained to the hon. Lady that security comes from rising employment, falling unemployment and reducing taxes so that people can keep more of the fruits of their labour. We are providing all those things.

Economy

10. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from representatives of manufacturing industry in East Anglia about the level of economic activity. [24322]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Treasury Ministers regularly receive representations on wide-ranging aspects of the economy including economic activity in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Thompson: Bearing in mind that prospects for the economy and for jobs in East Anglia are improving—the Government should take credit for those improvements—the overriding concern of business men and industrialists in East Anglia and Norwich is communications. Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that a financial priority—it must also be a priority for our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport—is the final dualling of the A11 link road between Norwich and London? That is vital. Will she take that into account, and will she visit Norwich to discuss it with local business leaders?

Mrs. Knight: I assure my hon. Friend that I will visit Norwich in early June as a consequence of the representations that he has made on behalf of his businesses. I will pass on his comments about the A11 to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. I assure my hon. Friend that the new method of financing roads will help communications in all parts of the country.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

11. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will assess the impact of the BSE crisis on his Budget policies. [24324]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will take account of any financial and economic consequences of BSE in framing my proposals for my Budget in November.

Mrs. Clwyd: As the Government have made such a ghastly mess of this whole issue, and since Goldman Sachs is predicting that it will add £1 billion to the public sector borrowing requirement in the next year, does the Chancellor think that that is why the Prime Minister has had to rule out tax cuts with which to bribe the electorate in November?

Mr. Clarke: The Government are handling this extremely serious crisis for the British farming industry most effectively. We are seeking to restore public confidence and to intervene effectively in the farming and food industries to keep them in good shape for the eventual recovery of the beef market. There will be costs, because we have carefully targeted compensation and joined in proposals for intervention measures to ensure that the farming and food industries do not suffer because of a short-term shock that was beyond their control.

We do have a reserve to cover just such unforeseen contingencies, and I expect to be able to meet the costs of any measures that we have to take to deal with the BSE crisis without breaking the new control total or our public expenditure plans.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Despite the disgracefully anti-British behaviour of the European Union over the British beef problem, has my right hon. and learned Friend been heartened by the fact that over this period the gilt edge market has remained entirely robust, thus indicating the confidence of the international investment community in Britain and in this Government?

Mr. Clarke: There is no scientific reason, as we all know, for the fears about eating British beef. The Government have had to counter the hysteria in this country and abroad that has led to falls in consumption at home and bans on our beef in America, Australia, New Zealand and the European Union. We are determined to ensure that the reputation of British beef is restored throughout the world. Indeed, the British beef industry deserves to be as healthy as the bond market. I agree with my hon. Friend that the confidence of the bond market and the gilt edge market in our conduct of the British economy should eventually be reflected in beef industry sales and in confidence in the good quality of British beef.

Taxation

12. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of current levels of taxation on (a) individuals and (b) the economy. [24326]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: A family on average earnings is expected to be around £450 better off this year. I expect current levels of taxation to help to sustain a good level of recovery for the economy, with rising employment and rising prosperity.

Mr. Hoyle: Will the Chancellor confirm that the average family paid less total tax in 1979-80 than it does today? He says that cutting taxes is not a priority, yet the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) says that taxes must be slashed. Who is right? Is it any surprise that The Daily Telegraph today states that the Government are a disaster?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman's proposition is wrong. The average family in 1979 paid less tax than now because it earned so much less and was much poorer. The average family today, after tax and inflation in today's money, is more than £4,000 a year better off than in 1979. It is true that in that year the Labour Government had got the percentage of taxation down to a low level, but they combined that with a 7 per cent. of GDP public sector borrowing requirement—which is merely taxation postponed. Indeed, the Conservative Government had to raise taxes in 1981 to pay for that. Now, taxation is falling, the economy is growing and personal living standards are rising. That would never have been achieved by the former Labour Government and will never be achieved by a future Labour Government.

Mr. Forman: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take every opportunity in his next Budget to see what further improvements can be made to the regime of corporate taxation, as it is vital that this country has a corporate tax regime that is competitive with the most competitive countries in the world?

Mr. Clarke: We continually look for ways to lighten the cost burdens on those who create employment and wealth. We already have the lowest rates of corporate taxation in western Europe, and we have a particularly low rate for small businesses. But I agree that this must be given a high priority in future policies if we are to continue to build up the kind of healthy enterprise economy that we want.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Did I miss it, or did the Chancellor blunder into the admission that the share of tax take is higher now than it was in 1979?

Mr. Clarke: It is much lower than the average during the previous Labour Government. The economy is bigger, personal living standards are higher and taxation is now coming down. All that will be reversed if we return to the policies of the former Labour Government. I thought that only people like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) sing the praises of the last failed Labour Government and claim that they will base themselves on that Government's policies, which took public debt and inflation to record levels, increased unemployment and brought this country to ruin—from which only a Conservative Government could rescue it.

Decimalisation

13. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how long the decimalisation of the United Kingdom's currency took from its inception to its complete implementation. [24333]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The decision to go ahead with decimalisation was announced in March 1966. The first Decimal Currency Act was passed in July 1967. Decimalisation took place on 15 February 1971. I still refer to 50p as 10 bob.

Mr. Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that the British people do not want, after fighting two world wars for freedom, to give up their pound for a single currency? Is she further aware that the lot opposite would sign everything away to Europe? Is it not a fact that we are the party of the Union Jack and that it is the party of the skull and crossbones of Brussels?

Mrs. Knight: Nobody can ask such questions as well as my hon. Friend. Not only do I agree with him—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—as regards the attitude of the lot opposite, but it would impose a jobs tax on all of us. Thanks to the opt-out negotiated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister at Maastricht, the United Kingdom will not take part in a single currency unless that is in the interests of the United Kingdom.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 April. [24304]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Michael Heseltine): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is in the Ukraine, ahead of the G8 Moscow summit on nuclear safety and security.

Mr. Dykes: Is my right hon. Friend aware that I much agree with his anxieties about the need to avoid creating an unnecessarily heavy bureaucracy in London? However, in view of the excellent Evening Standard campaign for the notion of just an elected mayor and the fact that millions of Londoners do not want that concept to be the preserve of one or more than one political party, will my right hon. Friend think again about that proposal and return with further thoughts in due course—bearing it in mind that London, like other capital cities, needs to be famous and have an elected mayor?

The Deputy Prime Minister: The Government have explored that idea but it would be realistic to say that no hon. Members on either side of the House gave it overwhelming acclaim. Opposition came from Members of Parliament and from the local authority community. It is apparent that one can move to a directly elected mayor only with a root-and-branch overhaul of London's local government structure, including the relationship between local and central Government. I do not believe that there is a public appetite for that, facing the real and urgent issues that the Government are addressing with such success for London.

Mr. Prescott rose—

Hon. Members: Middle class.

Madam Speaker: Order. Calm down.

Mr. Prescott: Please.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister remember his shrewd analysis of November 1990—that the only way to restore the fortunes of the Conservative party was to dump Prime Minister Thatcher? Following the Tories' humiliation in South-East Staffordshire last Thursday, what is the right hon. Gentleman's analysis now?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman because I have a new analysis. This week has seen three blows to the middle classes. First, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) admitted that the Labour party will put up their taxes. Secondly, we learned that Labour will tax company cars. Thirdly, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has become a member of the middle classes.

Mr. Prescott: The right hon. Gentleman should realise that all classes voted for Labour in South-East Staffordshire. Will he explain to the House why, if it was right to dump Prime Minister Thatcher in 1990 when the Tories were so unpopular, it is not right to dump Prime Minister Major now when the Tories are even more unpopular?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Because, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, all classes gave this Prime Minister the biggest popular vote in the history of the Conservative party, and because the conditions are now in place to secure a fifth Conservative victory. There are excellent economic forecasts and improving standards in education, and we shall see the current Prime Minister back in his job after the next general election.

Mr. Prescott: Is not the real problem for the Tories the fact that whatever they do will not make a scrap of difference, because, as The Daily Telegraph—the bible of the middle classes—said today:

"this Government is a disaster."?

Is it not time that the Deputy Prime Minister realised that the only answer is for him, his Government and the country to be put out of their misery by calling a general election now?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Not only has the right hon. Gentleman joined the middle classes; he has started reading a middle-class newspaper. The fact is that, however much one may disagree with much of today's leader in The Daily Telegraph, one thing I can agree with wholeheartedly is that it realises that a Government formed of Opposition Members would be infinitely worse.

Mr. Harris: What assurance can my right hon. Friend give fishermen from my constituency and from ports all round the coast of the United Kingdom who have come to London today—they are sailing up the Thames now—about the future of the industry? I agree with my right hon. Friend that we cannot withdraw unilaterally from the common fisheries policy and remain a member of the European Union, but does he agree that the common fisheries policy is inflicting huge damage on the industry and that it must be torn up and renegotiated?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is as well informed on fishing issues and policy as anyone in the House. I have just had a word with my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibilities for fisheries, who is to receive a delegation from the wider delegation that is in London today and who will be exploring its concerns. We have already dealt with some of its concerns. We are working closely with scientists on, for example, conservation to find more effective means of dealing with its concern. We have also made it clear that, in the context of the intergovernmental conference, we shall be raising the issue of quota hopping. We shall listen extremely carefully to the representatives of the fishing industry.

Q2. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 April. [24306]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jamieson: Is not the Deputy Prime Minister's real objection to the idea of a mayor for London that he loves new titles only when he can have them?

The Deputy Prime Minister: Having moved from being President to Deputy Prime Minister, it may not seem to be an advance now to become a mayor. If, on the other hand, by the united view of the House I were to be offered the job, I would have seriously to consider it.

Mr. Butcher: Does my right hon. Friend have a sneaking respect for those good, honest socialists who are stinking rich but who are prepared to argue that the rich should pay higher taxes? Would he, therefore, like to remind such people—Ben Elton, Maureen Lipman, Ken Follett and Melvyn Bragg—that nothing is stopping them now from voluntarily contributing more taxes? If we are to take the Ladywood line, anyone who is tempted to vote Labour who is currently earning a Member of Parliament's salary of £34,000 or more can start paying extra taxes now if they want to, because there may not be a future Labour Government to force them to do so.

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a most important point. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer who, the House will note, is in his place, mentioned to me that anyone who wants to get in touch with him and make a gesture pro bono publico will be warmly received. But the PSBR is coming down anyway, so there is no immediate need to make any request of that sort.

The serious issue for the House is not whether there should be higher or lower public expenditure or tax but whether an Opposition party can systematically refuse to answer any questions about whether it intends to raise taxes, and for whom. An Opposition spokesman was literally clawed off the airwaves on a day when she should have been dealing with her major responsibility on the privatisation of British Rail because the Labour party was terrified that she would not tell the truth but repeat the truth.

Q3. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 April. [24308]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: On the subject of tax, the figures that we heard this morning showed an outturn for the year just gone of a PSBR of £32 billion against a projection of £21 billion. Does the Deputy Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor, who on "The World at One" today said that if before the next Budget the figures for the year that we have just started showed that the real PSBR was still £30 billion or higher, there would be no scope for tax cuts? Does he accept that that will mean that in the history of this Administration there will not have been tax cuts under the Tories, there are not now tax cuts under the Tories and, if all independent fiscal advice is prudently followed, there cannot be tax cuts before the next election under the Tories?

The Deputy Prime Minister: As I understand Liberal policy, the hon. Gentleman should support the Government in the Lobby. The Liberal party constantly seeks to increase tax bills, but my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor will make judgments about the proper balance between public provision and tax reductions. What everyone knows, and what my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor's last Budget made clear, is that when it can be prudently done, a Conservative Government will reduce taxes. That is why there has been a significant improvement in people's real disposable income in the past few weeks, as taxes have come down under this Conservative Government.

Q4. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 18 April. [24310]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Sir Michael Neubert: Does my right hon. Friend bank at Barclays? Was it not an awful waste of the bank's money to send the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) all the way to Hong Kong—

Madam Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he must ask the Deputy Prime Minister questions on matters for which he has responsibility as a Minister.

Sir Michael Neubert: With UK share prices hitting record highs, with unemployment coming down yet again this month by 27,500, and with price rises at their lowest levels for a generation, would not the hon. Member for Hartlepool do more to his own advantage by staying closer to home?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this subject because it is apparent from an article in The Times that the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) had a task that could be interpreted as being in support of Government policy. He said:

"We must step up our efforts to promote the town" of Hartlepool.

"I am pleased to announce that during Easter I am travelling to Japan, Korea, Hong Kong and Singapore to beat the drum for investment in Hartlepool."

That is Government policy. The problem is, of course, that the trip was paid for by Barclays bank and it has a different view. It said in the article:

"The trip had nothing to do with Hartlepool. The only connection we have with Hartlepool is a branch in the High Street."

Mr. Galloway: Has the Deputy Prime Minister had time to see the devastating pictures of the shattered United Nations peacekeepers' base in the south of Lebanon? In the past few hours, more than 50 Fijian soldiers, Lebanese and Palestinian refugees—men, women and children—have been slaughtered by the Israeli invasion force. Does the right hon. Gentleman know that this morning, some hours earlier, a mother, her four-day-old child and her six other children were killed by an Israeli air raid on her home in south Lebanon? Does he agree that the flames now burning in Lebanon run the risk of burning to ash all the hopes of the peace process in the middle east? Will the British Government support an emergency meeting of the Security Council to try to bring the cycle of devastating violence to an end?

The Deputy Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Member for raising the subject of that appalling human tragedy, which shows all of us in the House how fragile peace processes are and how innocent the victims can often be. I have personally seen Fijian soldiers serving in the interest of the United Nations. They are an immensely impressive force and they do a wholly desirable task on behalf of a wider world. But when one considers the issues involved in south Lebanon and the attacks that Hezbollah has made on Israel from there, it is apparent that one is facing a near intractable problem of the deepest concern to the international community. The Government will do all that we can to play any part in accelerating the processes of peace and the restoration of a ceasefire. That, I understand, is the Israeli position and we strongly support that position. I am sure that the House will extend its sympathy to the relatives of those who were so unfortunately killed in today's incident.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): May I ask the Leader of the House for details of future business?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 APRIL—Consideration in Committee of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Bill.

TUESDAY 23 APRIL—Conclusion of consideration in Committee and remaining stages of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Bill.

WEDNESDAY 24 APRIL—Until 12.30 pm, debate on the National Heritage Committee report on the British Film Industry, followed by a debate on the reports from the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration and the Social Security Committee on the Child Support Agency. Followed by debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

In the afternoon, consideration in Committee of the Family Law Bill [Lords]. Followed by remaining stages of the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill.

THURSDAY 25 APRIL—Consideration of any Lords Amendments that may be received to the Rating (Caravans and Boats) Bill.

Followed by remaining stages of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill.

FRIDAY 26 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

On a more provisional basis, the business planned for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 29 APRIL—Progress on remaining stages of the Housing Bill.

TUESDAY 30 APRIL—Conclusion of remaining stages of the Housing Bill.

Motions relating to the Education (Grants for Nursery Education) (England) Regulations and the Education (Grants for Education Support and Training: Nursery Education) (England) Regulations.

WEDNESDAY 1 MAY—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Motion on the Elections (Northern Ireland) Order. Followed by a motion on the Deregulation and Contracting Out (Northern Ireland) Order.

Followed by remaining stages of the Licensing (Amendment) (Scotland) Bill.

THURSDAY 2 MAY—Second Reading of the Arbitration Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 3 MAY—The House will not be sitting.

The House may also be asked to consider any Lords messages that may be received.

On this occasion, I can even go so far as to give the House some helpful information about the following week. Monday 6 May is a bank holiday and the House will not be sitting.

I am trying to make my announcements on European Standing Committees a little more user-friendly. The House will wish to know that European Standing Committees will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 24 April to consider European Community documents as follows:

European Standing Committee A: There will be a debate on agricultural strategy for the European Union and the associated countries of central and eastern Europe.

European Standing Committee B: There will be a debate on five documents relating to economic and monetary union.

Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

It may also be for the convenience of the House to know that it is proposed that European Standing Committee A will meet on Wednesday 1 May to debate natural mineral waters.

[Wednesday 24 April:

European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 12503/95, Agricultural Strategy: EU and the Associated Countries. Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 51-vi (1995-96).

European Standing Committee B—European Community Documents: (a) 11987/95, Progress towards Convergence; (b) 10380/95, Employment in Europe; (c) 11417/95, Effect of Currency Fluctuations on the Internal Market; (d) 11478/95, Social Security and Related Expenditure; (e) 12633/95, Exchange Rate Relations in Stage Three of Economic and Monetary Union. Relevant European Legislation Reports: HC 51-v (1995-96) and HC 51-x (1995-96).

Wednesday 1 May:

European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 12712/95, Natural Mineral Waters. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC 51-viii (1995-96) and HC 51-xiv (1995-96).]

Mrs. Taylor: May I thank the Leader of the House for that information and in particular for the notice of the provisional business for the week after next? Will he build on that good will by giving as early an indication as possible to the House of the likely date of this year's summer economic debate? That would be of interest to all hon. Members. May I also ask him to ensure that the House is kept fully informed of any developments on bovine spongiform encephalopathy? He knows that there are still unresolved issues following Tuesday's statement. It is important that hon. Members should be able to continue to express their views and concern on that vital issue.

We now know that next Wednesday, European Standing Committee B will consider certain EC documents. The Leader of the House will be aware that I have raised with him the concerns expressed by Members on both sides of the House and by the Select Committee on European Legislation, that those matters should be debated on the Floor of the House rather than in Committee. As the issues involved include the impact of currency fluctuations on the internal market, progress towards convergence and exchange rate relations in stage 3 of economic and monetary union, may I ask him, even at this late stage, to reconsider his decision that those issues should be dealt with in Committee? If he will not change his mind on that, will he remind hon. Members that any Member can attend and participate in that Committee's discussions?

Will the Leader of the House find Government time for a debate on the future of the electricity industry? It is vital that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report currently sitting on the desk of the President of the Board of Trade is published and debated as soon as possible. All Members need access to that report, and it is important that the House should make an early decision on the best way forward for the electricity industry.

Finally, on another extremely important matter, will the Leader of the House ensure that there will be time in the near future for Ministers to come to the House and make it clear what action has been taken since last year's water supply crisis to protect the interests of families and industry throughout the country, especially in Yorkshire? We should be given a proper assessment by Ministers of what has been done since last summer and Ministers should be prepared to intervene as soon as action might be necessary to conserve water for this year. The Government cannot abdicate their responsibility for the health and economic implications of severe water shortages. We should debate the matter and there should be action by Ministers before another crisis occurs.

Mr. Newton: I note with appreciation the hon. Lady's introductory remarks and, as always, I shall seek to give the House the earliest possible indication of the summer economic debate.

On BSE, I think that everything that has happened in the past two or three weeks shows my willingness, and, indeed, that of my right hon. Friends, to keep the House closely informed of developments. Of course, we shall maintain that posture.

On the debate in European Standing Committee B, I doubt that the hon. Lady harboured hopes that I would change my mind at the Dispatch Box this afternoon. I cleave to the view that, in general, the very fact that Ministers can be closely questioned gives those debates some advantages over a conventional debate on the Floor of the House. I underline her reminder that another advantage of the format is that, although they would not be able to vote if there were a vote, any hon. Member can attend and speak at such meetings.

I have no plans for a debate in Government time on the electricity industry. The hon. Lady will be aware that consideration of MMC reports is undertaken by the President of the Board of Trade, who acts in what virtually amounts to a semi-judicial capacity. The time to contemplate such a debate, if there were such a time, would be when a conclusion had been reached on those reports.

I imagine that the hon. Lady's request for Ministers to make clear the current state of the water supply industry is influenced in part by her understandable and legitimate constituency considerations. I shall bring her remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, who, I note, will be in the House to answer questions on Tuesday 30 April.

Sir Jim Spicer (West Dorset): My right hon. Friend will have heard the reports of the speech made last night by the Commissioner responsible for farming, which make it clear that the meeting on 29 April will not result in the lifting of the ban on British beef. Against the background of the crisis that that fact poses for our farming community, does my right hon. Friend think that it might be possible for us to find time for a debate not on BSE but on British beef and its future? Given that we still import 30 per cent. of our beef from overseas and the European Community, is it not time that we told the public how they can help us to cut that import figure from 30 per cent. to nil and to increase the consumption of British beef to 100 per cent.?

Mr. Newton: I certainly think that many of my hon. Friends and Opposition Members would welcome the debate that my hon. Friend has proposed, even though I cannot say snap immediately to his proposal. I, too, would welcome any opportunity to remind people that scientists say that British beef is safe; the World Health Organisation says that British beef is safe; the Agriculture Commissioner says that British beef is safe; and in my view, British beef is safe. I am continuing to eat it.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I join other hon. Members in thanking the Leader of the House for the maximum advance notice of forthcoming business.

We have heard today's formal announcement that a total of two days will be given for proceedings in the House on the Bill on the Northern Ireland elections at the end of May. As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, that is the second piece of legislation that he has had to bring before us in recent weeks that has been subject to an extremely tight timetable and has been rushed through, by any definition. May I ask him to give us an undertaking, if not today, at a later date, that if we are ever asked by his or any other Government to pass emergency legislation, the old precedent will apply, whereby it will stand on the statute book for one year only and can have a longer duration only if it is properly debated without a guillotine in due time?

Secondly, there is obvious interest in the House about the future structure of local government, with different views on both sides about mayors for councils and the structure of local government. After the local elections this year, may we have a debate about local government and its future, so that the range of options for the best running of it can be aired without the influence of the party Whips?

Mr. Newton: I shall bear both points in mind, as is entirely right and proper. In respect of any Bill, whether emergency or otherwise, one can consider points such as that raised by the hon. Gentleman only in relation to the nature of such legislation.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): May I thank my right hon. Friend for his announcement of the debates next week, on the Adjournment of the House, on the film industry and the Child Support Agency, although both those subjects merit a full day's debate rather than a half-day one? May I also support the call from the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), the shadow Leader of the House, for an early date for the summer economic debate, not least so that we can hear from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) her views on increased taxation, because many of us on the Conservative Benches believe that increased taxation is prejudicial to a healthy and growing economy?

Mr. Newton: The second part of my hon. Friend's question was characteristically helpful, and I shall bear it in mind. On the first part of his question, no doubt the Chairman of the Liaison Committee—with whom those matters are normally discussed and on whose recommendations we normally proceed—will have considered what it is appropriate to suggest. I am glad that we have been able to provide time for debates on those two important matters.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we please have an early debate on the alarming rise of arson attacks in the county of Leicestershire, which are up from 273 in 1988 to 1,385 in 1995? As five arson attacks have been made against schools in my constituency in the past three months—the latest of which caused grave damage to Beaumont Leys school—will the Leader of the House plead with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to find a way in which schools can be helped to take security measures without cutting into their budgets, which are already far too short?

Mr. Newton: The hon. and learned Gentleman has raised that matter and others like it on a number of occasions. He will know that it is a matter that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment takes seriously. I shall bring to her attention the fact that he has raised the issue yet again, in an entirely responsible and balanced way. However, I hope that when he refers to crime in Leicestershire, he will acknowledge that recorded crime in the area fell by some 6 per cent. last year, including some important falls in quite significant crimes.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May I ask my right hon. Friend for a debate next week on the decision of two London local authorities—both of which are Labour controlled, and including Ealing council—to take travel passes away from disabled people, including deaf people and severely disabled people, to save a few thousand pounds, despite the fact that they have been given millions of pounds for their standard spending assessments by the Government? Bearing in mind the great suffering of the people involved and their huge distress, could we have a debate next week to expose those councils and seek to have their miserable behaviour reversed?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate but, as ever, I point my hon. Friend in the direction of Wednesday mornings. I share his regret about the reports that he made, as I am a former Minister for the Disabled.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire): We have had several statements on BSE and we have been promised more. The other place has also debated BSE. Should we not have a debate about BSE before Whitsun? If there is a problem about the wide-ranging nature of the debate, could we not have debates on specific areas? For example, could we debate live tests on animals that would allow us a way out of the problem?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will know that the issue of live tests has been put to my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on a number of occasions. He has explained the scientific and practical difficulty that no such test currently exists nor is in sight. However, I shall bring the point to his attention again. We have already had one debate on BSE, which I arranged at an early stage—and I acknowledge that it was for only three hours. I think that there may well be a case for a further debate at some stage, and I shall very much bear that in mind.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (North Dorset): Does my right hon. Friend agree that following the excellent package on BSE that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced on Tuesday and the welcome news that the Euro ban is to be challenged, there is a case for a debate on this matter, on the particular issue of how to restore confidence in British beef and the eating thereof? Does my right hon. Friend agree that such a debate could demonstrate the concerns that members of the public have about the damage caused to our beef industry by hysteria and by the selfish attitude shown by our European neighbours and their Governments? We ought to have a debate to encourage consumers and to promote the eating of British beef—which can be done with pride and not with apology.

Mr. Newton: I have already commented on that matter. I take note of what my hon. Friend said. We shall press our points very hard within the European Union. On the question of confidence, I hope that my hon. Friend will take some encouragement from the fact that the latest reports suggest that beef consumption is at roughly 85 per cent. of pre-crisis levels and that cattle throughput in markets is nearing 60 per cent. of pre-crisis levels. While that is a long way short of what we would like, it is quite good progress.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): I draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the statement made by European Commissioner Fischler that he has no objection, in principle, to ending the ban on beef exports from specialist areas such as Scotland and Northern Ireland. Is he aware that there is legal precedent for that and that the only stumbling block is the failure of the British Government to press the case? I ask the right hon. Gentleman for an urgent statement or debate, either on the Floor of the House or in the Grand Committee, bearing it in mind that no Scottish Office Minister has made himself answerable on that important issue.

Mr. Newton: On the latter point, Scottish Office Ministers, including very much my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, have been active in developing the measures that have been announced. My right hon. Friend is available to answer questions during the period covered by my statement. As for the interpretation that the hon. Gentleman places on the remarks said to have been made by Commissioner Fischler, I have not seen a complete report of those remarks. I am aware, however, that many people would not share the interpretation that the hon. Gentleman has sought to place upon them.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): May I ask my right hon. Friend to arrange an urgent and early debate on early-day motion 728?

[That this House notes the honesty and integrity of the honourable Member for Birmingham, Ladywood, in stating her view as an honourable Labour Member that people earning more than £34,000 should pay more tax; agrees with her contempt for the ruthless arrogance of the staff of the Leader of the Opposition; and finds this latest episode shows Labour has not changed, in contrast to its marketing managers.]

Such a debate would enable me to praise the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short) for observing that many people would pay higher taxes under a Labour Government. If such a debate were to take place, the hon. Lady might not be silenced by the Leader of the Opposition, but I doubt it.

Mr. Newton: I shall bear my hon. Friend's request very much in mind. I, too, welcome the candour of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), who has at least been willing to acknowledge things that we all know, but which no one else has been prepared to say.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): The Leader of the House will have heard the question put to the Deputy Prime Minister by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway), about the incident today in southern Lebanon. May I draw to the right hon. Gentleman's attention early-day motion 731?

[That this House deplores the air strikes by Israel against civil Lebanese targets, including Beirut, and the collective threat forcing 400,000 Lebanese civilians to flee from their homes, and while in no manner giving any support to armed action by Hizbollah, notes the illegality of Israel's occupation of South Lebanon in defiance of UN Security Council Resolution 425; welcomes initiatives to bring about a cessation of Israeli military action; and urges the United Kingdom Government to act in co-operation with France and other willing European countries to broker a ceasefire and to explore the widest range of options which could lead to a just and lasting settlement on the basis of UN resolutions.]

The motion draws attention to Israeli action in Lebanon and expresses the concerns of many Members on both sides of the House about what is happening and the approach of the Israelis to the problems in the Lebanon. If we do not have a debate, let us at the very least have a ministerial statement at the earliest opportunity, so that there is a chance for Members to speak directly and to question a Minister on policy on an important matter.

Mr. Newton: I heard the question asked by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway). I heard also the reply of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, which I thought entirely appropriate and balanced. I do not think that I would wish to add to it.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration to the observations of the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh)? It is particularly important that we have a debate so that people such as myself can draw attention to the fact that the National Farmers Union of Scotland and other organisations have made it clear at public meetings that I have attended that they think that we must find a United Kingdom answer, and that anything that is done to divide us is likely to damage our long-term prospects in the negotiations with the rest of our partners in the Union.

Mr. Newton: I simply say that I am grateful to my hon. Friend for what I thought to be sensible remarks.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): May we have a debate on the constitution, so that I can find a better answer to a question asked of me by a 10-year-old constituent of mine on television? He aspires to a certain job, but I had to tell him that he would never achieve his ambition because he is British. He could realise his ambition if he were American or a citizen of many other countries. Would it not be useful if we had a debate on the constitution, so that we could discover why the job of Head of State is confined to members of one undistinguished family?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to follow him down that path. I have no plans for such a debate.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (North Warwickshire): May we have an urgent debate on the relationship between the Home Secretary and chief constables, following great concern caused to several Warwickshire Members about what appear to be allegations against the chief constable of the county by the Home Secretary during an interview last Friday, when he suggested that the view of the chief constable and the police authority, that there was a financial crisis in the Warwickshire constabulary, was a myth and that someone was making up figures?

Mr. Newton: I have no direct account of my right hon. and learned Friend's remarks. I would not for a moment go along with the interpretation that the hon. Gentleman appears to be putting on them. It seems entirely appropriate for my right hon. and learned Friend, in that or any other context, to remind people of the increased resources for the police that have been steadily made available by the Government.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): Will there be an opportunity for a debate next week on the appalling level of racial violence in south Wales? According to Home Office figures, the number of reported racial incidents has increased by 29 per cent., which is more than three times the average across England and Wales in police authority regions and is extremely serious. What action do the Government intend to take on that?

Mr. Newton: In a way, that links with the previous question. The Government have made clear their commitment to increasing the resources and to various changes in policy and legislation designed to strengthen what is shorthanded as law and order. That would very much include our wish to see a reduction, indeed a removal, of incidents of racial harassment. The hon. Gentleman may wish to bring his concerns further to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who is here to answer questions on Monday week.

Orders of the Day

Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble).

3.55 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill, and the election for which it provides, are a means to an end. Together, they open a gateway into all-party negotiations. It is the only gateway available. I will describe why the Bill is needed.

All-party negotiations, comprehensive in their agenda, inclusive in their composition and successful in their outcome, have for years been the Government's objective. I believe that they have also been the objective of the constitutional political parties of Northern Ireland.

The history and background are well known. To promote negotiations, I know that political risks have been taken by many of Northern Ireland's politicians, sustained by the fervent wishes of the people of Northern Ireland. I am glad to acknowledge that today, and with considerable admiration.

Yet always at the root of the problem has been lack of confidence: lack of confidence that proper negotiations on the way ahead were possible between all democratically mandated parties. That lack of confidence has been built on generations of corrosive mistrust in the intentions of one community towards another, and on 25 years of terrorist activity, fundamentally hostile to democracy and reconciliation.

By proper negotiations, I mean negotiations whose participants all conform to the language used by the two Governments in paragraph 10 of the Downing street declaration made 28 months ago. That language spoke of parties which establish a commitment to exclusively peaceful methods, and which have shown that they abide by the democratic process. Those, it is said, were the parties that were free to participate fully in democratic politics, and to join in dialogue in due course between the Governments and the political parties on the way ahead.

In a democracy, nobody can be expected to sit down and negotiate politically with people who do not meet those requirements. As to that, there has never been any doubt as to the proper commitment of the two Governments, nor of the parties that represent the overwhelming majority of people on all sides of the community in Northern Ireland.

The House will recall the consistent efforts that have been made to bring such negotiations about. I will not rehearse them now. The Bill, however, offers a new way forward, to bring all parties together in negotiations on 10 June. It was an idea endorsed, as a confidence-building measure, by Mitchell. It was an idea for an elective process, which would give a mandate to participate in all-party negotiations, notwithstanding that prior decommissioning had not begun.

We concluded that that was, in the event, the only available route offering a viable, direct and speedy way into negotiations. So broad proposals were set out in the joint communiqué which followed a meeting between the Prime Minister and Mr. Bruton on 28 February. The Bill stems directly from that communiqué.

I now turn to the Bill and to the Command Paper published with it. The Bill is rightly entitled a Bill for "entry to negotiations". At its centre is a scheme for the elective process to which we committed ourselves in the communiqué of 28 February. Its motive is the creation of a mandate to sit down and negotiate with all parties, and to create thereby in all the parties the confidence to do so.

The Bill itself provides in detail for elections, for a forum, and for referendums. It does not itself provide for negotiations. It is, as I have said, a gateway for negotiations, not a blueprint for them. Therefore, following a useful and constructive process of consultation, we published at the same time a Command Paper setting out the best judgment of the two Governments, who will be participants as appropriate, as to the most suitable and broadly acceptable ground rules for all-party negotiations, beginning on 10 June. The negotiations referred to in the Bill are those described in the Command Paper.

At the outset, we state the purpose of the negotiations: to achieve a new beginning for relationships within Northern Ireland, within the island of Ireland and between the peoples of these islands, and to agree new institutions and structures to take account of the totality of relationships. Any participant in the strand in question, therefore, will be free to raise any aspect of the three relationships, including constitutional issues and any other matter that it considers relevant.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): This is obviously a very important Bill, and it is very important for the people of Northern Ireland. Perhaps the Secretary of State should delay his speech a little, as no hon. Member from the second largest party in Northern Ireland seems to be present.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I propose to proceed with the speech that I have been called on by Madam Speaker to deliver.

I must here make a most important point about participation. I take it from paragraph 9 of the Command Paper. Both Governments are agreed that participation of Sinn Fein in negotiations requires the unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994. By the IRA terminating its ceasefire, and by its abominable attacks thereafter in London, it has totally excluded itself from political negotiations. I shall return to that.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): My right hon. and learned Friend has stated again that Sinn Fein-IRA will have to reinstate their ceasefire. Will he make it clear that, this time, it will have to be permanent, that it will have to be declared to be permanent and that there must be no weasel words that fall short of saying that they will never ever return to violence?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The Governments have agreed that there shall be an unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994, but there is a difference, and that is the requirement for the removal of the self-imposed exclusion that exists at present on Sinn Fein entering negotiations. What is new is that the Governments also agree—this is set out in the communiqué—that, at the beginning of those negotiations, it, like every other participating party, must make it clear that it is totally and absolutely committed to the six principles of democracy and non-violence set out in the Mitchell report, and at the same time additionally address the proposals made in that report for decommissioning.

Mr. Wilshire: I apologise for pressing this point, but, although my right hon. and learned Friend rehearsed the general terms, he did not address whether or not this time Sinn Fein-IRA will have to make it crystal clear that any ceasefire is permanent, for real and for ever.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I repeat the language of the communiqué and of the two Governments. There must be an unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994. That, in the ordinary English interpretation of the language, means one that admits of no other interpretation. That is the agreement of the two Governments.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I note that the parties listed in the schedule as able to stand in the elections include Sinn Fein, while other Northern Ireland parties which have stood in elections—such as the Workers Socialist party and the Irish Republican Socialist party—are not included. Have they not been prepared to make an unequivocal statement that they are committed to Northern Ireland?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Following the consultation paper, all parties that have asked the Government to include them have been included, along with those listed in the original Government paper. No party that has asked to be included has been excluded.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): As the Secretary of State will realise, this is important to those of us who come from Northern Ireland. How will he decide that the IRA ceasefire—if it comes—is for real, if it comes only a few hours before he calls the meeting on 10 June?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I appreciate the importance of the question, but I think it sensible to view the circumstances that prevail at the relevant time in their entirety. I do not believe that it is possible to give a hypothetical answer to a hypothetical question of that kind, or that it would be prudent to do so. I think that the participants will want to take into account all the circumstances that obtain at the relevant time.

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Can the Secretary of State throw some light on the list in the second part of the schedule? Are all these parties with funny titles of western European origin? Some of us support the Westminster Foundation for Democracy in Eastern Europe, but I had no idea that we had been quite so successful.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will discover that he has wrought better than he knew, but the organisations that appear in the second part of schedule 1 constitute, for the purposes of the Bill, the parties that will participate in the election.

The agenda for the negotiations will be open, with no outcome either predetermined or excluded in advance. A meaningful and inclusive process of negotiation must be genuinely offered to address the legitimate concerns of all traditions and the need for new political arrangements with which all can identify. That language is taken from the communiqué of 28 February, and we hold to it.

The two Prime Ministers described that as a confidence-building measure, but two other confidence measures were also said to be necessary, and they bear importantly on the process of the negotiations. The Command Paper sets them out, stating:

"all participants would need to make clear at the beginning of the discussions their total and absolute commitment to the principles of democracy and non-violence set out in the report of the International Body. They would also need to address, at that stage, its proposals on decommissioning."

Mr. Robert McCartney (North Down): One of the confidence-building measures that are required is that the parties address the principles of the Mitchell commission. What exactly does that mean? It clearly does not mean that they must decommission; it does not imply any executive action on their part. "Addressing" may merely be nodding. Could it be that certain parties could progress through the negotiations having addressed the principles for decommissioning on several occasions, but never having addressed them right to the end?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Gently and in the interests of accuracy I shall correct the hon. and learned Gentleman's nomenclature. There are principles and proposals in the Mitchell report. The principles are those of democracy and non-violence: I think that they are in paragraph 20. Thereafter, there are proposals for decommissioning: they are in paragraph 34, and, I think, in paragraphs 39 to 45.

It will be necessary in relation to the latter, because I think that the hon. and learned Member's question centres on the proposals, for consultation to establish a means by which they are addressed. That can be done in more than one way, but it should be noted that both Governments stand four square on the ground rules in paragraph 12, which I have just read to the House, of the communiqué of 28 February.

Thereafter, those principles must be addressed. "Thereafter" does not mean that that will be done other than at the beginning of the negotiating process. We shall have to secure greater clarity about the way in which that will be implemented, and it is important that the consultation should take place, and should take place soon.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): The Minister spoke about the principles being addressed. Are those to form the first item on the agenda, and must they be overcome, or will they be addressed throughout the negotiations? I am confused by what the Minister said.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Once again, I draw the distinction between the principles and the proposals. The principles are those of democracy and non-violence, and the proposals are about decommissioning. In the words of the communiqué and of the ground rules paper, the decommissioning proposals have to be addressed at the beginning of the negotiations along with the signing up to the principles that I have identified.

[Sir Patrick Mayhew]

How that is to be done is a matter for further consultation, and it will ultimately be a matter for agreement between the participants. In the light of the language that was agreed by the two Governments, it would not be sensible for me at this juncture to attempt to be more precise than that. It is a matter for consultation, which needs to take place soon. I have read to the House the passage from paragraph 12 of the communiqué.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I am sorry to interrupt the Secretary of State again. He alluded to the section in Cmnd. 3232 which mentions participants in the election making an absolute commitment to the principles of democracy and non-violence. Does he not recognise that those have long been a requirement of people who are involved in local government in Northern Ireland, and that that commitment has not been worth the time that it has taken to sign the piece of paper?

Does the Secretary of State recall an incident that affected me, in which a Sinn Fein councillor on Dungannon district council, Martin McCaughey, was conspiring to murder those of us who sat in the council chamber with him? Martin McCaughey was ultimately killed by the security forces as he was about to commit a murder. Is it not time that there was something tangible in terms of these commitments? If that cannot be found, we may finish up with a procedure that is a mockery of democracy.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's experience in the forum that he describes and in many other forums, including the military one in Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to him for that. As he says, those who wish to participate in local government have to make a declaration. The principles of democracy and non-violence, which are set out in the Mitchell report and which I shall, if the House permits, read out in a minute in their totality, go much further than that. They must have some significance in addition to what the hon. Gentleman describes, because Sinn Fein has carefully and resolutely refused to sign up to them since Mitchell was published. The Government immediately signified their acceptance of those principles, but Sinn Fein did not, because it found that it would be considerably inconvenient to do so. It should do so at once.

It follows from what the Governments have set out in the passage that I have just read that any participant who refused to sign up in that sense to each of the six Mitchell principles would forfeit the right to continue in negotiations with the Governments, and, in our view, with the democratic political parties.

I think that I am justified in reminding the House of the total and absolute commitments that the joint communiqué requires. They are: to democratic and exclusively peaceful means of resolving political issues; to the total disarmament of all paramilitary organisations; to agreement that such disarmament must be verifiable to the satisfaction of an independent commission; to the renunciation for themselves, and the opposition of any effort by others, to use force, or threaten to use force, to influence the course or the outcome of all-party negotiations; to agree to abide by the terms of any agreement reached in all-party negotiations, and to resort to democratic and exclusively peaceful methods in trying to alter any aspect of that outcome with which they disagree; and to urging that "punishment" killings and beatings stop, and taking effective steps to prevent such actions.

Those are the Mitchell principles, which go much further than what is required of those in local government. Much significance can be attached to Sinn Fein's refusal to accept them although they are fundamental—as Mitchell says—to any democratic society.

As the Prime Minister has said, Mitchell's proposals on decommissioning cannot be ducked or left to the end of negotiations. The communiqué stated that these must be addressed also at the beginning of the discussions. As the Prime Minister said in this House:

> "The question of decommissioning must be addressed at the beginning and progress must be made. There must be parallel decommissioning, as the Mitchell principle sets out. As the talks proceed, the decommissioning must proceed in parallel with the talks. The precise manner of that is a matter to be determined at the beginning of the talks."—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 505.]

How that shall be done must be a matter for further discussions with the participants.

I come now to the detail of the Bill. Clause 1 provides for the holding of an election to provide a pool of delegates. The detailed provision on the election is set out in schedule 1, which will be supplemented by an order to be made under it. The order will be subject to approval in draft after debate in this House and another place, and we envisage it being taken, if the present Bill is approved, in the week beginning 29 April.

Five delegates will be elected from each of the 18 parliamentary constituencies by a list system, and a further 20 for Northern Ireland as a whole. As a necessary corollary of the constituency list system, the second part of schedule 1 sets out those who may participate. The list has been drawn up following a consultation exercise. We have taken account of the representations made to us, and have sought to achieve as inclusive a system as is practicable.

It has not been possible to please everybody—indeed, it may not have been possible to please anybody, but that is the nature of the problem with which we are confronted. It is, in our view, the best way forward in what the Prime Minister has described as a unique situation.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Is it not strange that a party that might get 15 per cent., 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. of the vote will receive two representatives—the same number as a party that gets 1 per cent. of the vote? How can the Secretary of State describe that as democracy? The party that gets 1 per cent. of the vote might get no one elected to the forum, yet could get two people into the negotiations.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's point, and I admit that it is one of the sorenesses.

One of the interesting things about the consultation process was the wide degree of agreement that the smaller parties should find a means by which their voices could be heard in the negotiations. That was widely accepted. Of course, there was great divergence on how that should be achieved and, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced earlier, we decided that the best way to do it would be to allow representation on a Northern Ireland-wide basis to the extent of two seats for those parties which are among the top 10 in the aggregate of votes cast for them. We felt that it would not have been right to allow that Northern Ireland-wide constituency basis to be limited to the smaller parties.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick–upon–Tweed): I can save time by putting two points to the Secretary of State. If delegates are being elected in multi-member constituencies of five seats, it would have been better to allow preferential voting, because the single transferable vote system is familiar in the north and the south, and avoids the top-up mechanisms to which the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) has just referred. Does the Secretary of State recognise that it is important that there should be maximum participation in the elections, and that anything that can be done to maintain voter registration up to the time of the election is important?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Voter registration is important, and we shall be circulating appropriate literature.

I appreciate the point that has been made, and it can be made cogently and strongly. We made it clear that we wanted an election system which commanded the widest possible support. We consulted, and it proved impossible to reach universal agreement on any system, including STV.

I will not take the House's time by going through who wanted what and their views, but in light of the views given to us, we devised the system in the Bill, which seeks to combine some of the virtues of each of the main alternatives put to us and to give the people of Northern Ireland the clearest possible choice in the polling booth. I cannot pretend to expect applause from any quarter, but I hope that it will be sufficient to secure that all parties take their place in the elections.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North–East Derbyshire) rose—

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I must get on.

Much has been said, quite understandably, about the complications involved. It is not complicated for the voter. The voter puts one cross against one party. The problems come for others after that.

Mr. Barnes rose—

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I really must get on, because I know what a bore it is when Front-Bench speakers take too long in opening a debate of this character.

When the election is called, the nominating representative of each party which wishes to stand will submit to the chief electoral officer a list of between two and five candidates for any or all of the constituencies of Northern Ireland, and can also submit a regional list of up to 10 candidates, at least two of whom would be names not on any constituency list. Regional seat allocation will help small parties which secure sufficient Province-wide support but which might fail to secure a seat in a constituency to have a chance to be represented. I am required by clause 5 to identify those nominating representatives, and I shall do that after consultation.

As I have already said, the voter's choice is simple. He or she casts a single vote for a single party. Lists of candidates will be on display, and ballot papers will show party names. It has been suggested that, where a large number of parties appear, there may be scope for confusion. There is force in that suggestion, but there are many competing interests that must be served.

A variety of methods are practised for apportioning seats in countries that regularly conduct elections by party list. None of them appears inherently superior to the others, and, after consultation, we have decided on the system set out in the schedule. It is well recognised, and, I am informed, has been employed in several European countries over the years.

I have already mentioned the aggregation process that will lead to the two additional delegates, and I need not repeat that.

We intend that the disqualification provision for candidates should be the minimum necessary. Only offenders in prison, people detained on account of mental illness and those not of voting age are disqualified by paragraph 17 of the first schedule. The franchise is the same as that for local government elections in Northern Ireland.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): If the election is to be based on parliamentary constituencies, why is the franchise not based on the parliamentary franchise?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: We thought it desirable to use a local register; that is what we are going to use.

Mr. Taylor: Why?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Because a local representation seems a desirable thing. If the right hon. Gentleman wants to pursue that point, my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will deal with it more fully in the wind-up.

Rev. Ian Paisley rose—

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have already given way twice to the hon. Gentleman, and survived. I am not going to push my luck.

Moving back to the body of the Bill: clause 2 provides for the selection, from among delegates returned, of teams to participate in the negotiations, the proposed ground rules for which are published in the Command Paper. The Bill defines the negotiations by reference to that paper. We want all parties that have shown that they have sufficient electoral support to be involved in the negotiations.

Nevertheless, as both we and the Irish Government have consistently made plain, whether Sinn Fein takes its place in the negotiations is for the republican movement to decide. So that the position is clear, the Bill provides that I shall refrain from inviting nominations from any party where I consider that the requirements in the Command Paper are not met. I shall exercise that discretion, as was stated in the proposals of 21 March, after consultation, as appropriate, with the Irish Government.

Clause 3 speaks for itself. As the Bill itself makes plain, the forum is a deliberative body; it is no sense a legislative or proto-legislative one. Its purpose will be the discussion of issues relevant to promoting dialogue and understanding within Northern Ireland.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have given way frequently—

Mr. Canavan: Not to me, you haven't.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I cannot give way to everyone.

[Sir Patrick Mayhew]

The forum has no executive or administrative functions of any sort. Nor has it power to determine the conduct, course or outcome of the negotiations; but it may, by agreement among the participants in the negotiations as determined by their rules of procedures, consider matters referred to it by the negotiators.

Mr. Canavan rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am sorry; I have given way an awful lot, and now I must get on.

I believe that the forum has a most valuable role, neither threatening nor favouring any part of the community. It offers a new opportunity for people from differing political backgrounds to talk, and to listen to the views of others whom it may invite to address it, in order to promote dialogue and understanding. I believe that the forum offers real opportunities for constructive advance.

Mr. Canavan: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I am sorry, but I have taken a long time over clause 3, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman will permit me to continue. Indeed, I have already been speaking for nearly 35 minutes.

Schedule 2 sets out a number of points about forum procedure. I shall not go through all the detail, but I should recall that the Government have already made clear their view that the forum should proceed by broad consensus. At the start, it will have a set of rules of procedure provided by me. The forum will then be empowered, as is right, to propose its own rules. They must be agreed by at least 75 per cent. of those participating in any vote, and they will then require my approval. The forum is also to elect its own chairman. For that too, a 75 per cent. majority will be required in any vote; until it has made its choice, the chairmanship falls to a member nominated by me.

Mr. McNamara: I am sorry to be so persistent, and I do appreciate the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has given way generously, but he has just raised one of the most controversial areas at stake. I refer to moving away from the criteria in paragraph 24 of the Command Paper—about rules of procedure having to have the support of both communities—and towards a system based on a weighted majority.

Why have the Government departed from what was stipulated in the Command Paper? If, say, the official Unionist party abstained from the forum, its cause might be lost because a 75 per cent. majority could not be reached. We need representation of both communities.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The written statement published after consultation made it clear that we believe that the forum should proceed on the basis of broad consensus. The hon. Gentleman will note in schedule 2 that, when a chairman or when rules of procedure are selected, a majority of 75 per cent. will be required. It will be for the participants to determine what they wish to propose, and for the Secretary of State to determine whether or not to approve the rules.

Clause 4 provides for referendums. Its provisions are broadly cast, sufficiently to permit consultation on any arrangements emerging from the negotiations. Any such proposals for a referendum would need to be approved by Parliament, and there is no encroachment on the provisions for a poll in section 1 of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973.

After careful consideration, we have concluded that the case has not been made for a referendum to be held at the same time as elections. Clause 6 provides for payment of allowances to delegates for their participation in the negotiations or forum. Clause 7 gives one year as the life of the forum, but it may be continued in effect for a further year by order. It may also be suspended, and the Bill obliges me to provide for the forum to cease if negotiations are concluded or suspended—although it could be brought back into being if they subsequently resumed.

I regret the reasoned amendment. I know that the electoral system proposed in the Bill was not the first choice of any party, but, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister explained, none of the systems put forward by the different parties had the support of major parties representing each of the main communities. The Government have sought to consult on the detail of the scheme, and we are grateful to the various parties for their responses.

In Committee next week, we shall have more opportunity for detailed scrutiny. I accept that the electoral system is novel, but I reject that it will be confusing for the electorate. The voters will simply have to put a cross against the party of their choice—one vote for one party, which seems very simple.

I have spoken of the opportunities that the Bill opens up for the political parties in Northern Ireland, and of the challenges with which it provides them, but I have not yet spoken of one other sector in Northern Ireland—the people. So often in the past, the men and women of Northern Ireland have had no role in the political part of the peace process. Too often, they had simply to stand by and watch, while politicians and Governments talked behind closed doors. For them, the Bill provides the greatest opportunity and challenge.

The Bill, through the election process that it makes possible, changes that previous pattern. It gives the people of Northern Ireland a direct role in setting the negotiations in progress and providing the context and the mandate for them. Above all, that will give them a chance, by the strength of their votes for their chosen parties, to demonstrate the great yearning that exists on the ground to see talks taking place, understanding increased and an acceptable accommodation found. The Bill, for the first time, gives the people of Northern Ireland a voice in that talks process. I believe that they will not waste that chance.

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I endorse the Prime Minister's comments earlier today about last night's bomb. There is no way that parties can bomb their way to the negotiating table—that lesson must be learnt. We all share the view that such actions will not stand in the way of the peace process.

The Opposition welcome the package of measures, including the Bill, that is designed to enable negotiations to proceed on 10 June. We are pleased that the Government have come to share our view that it would be unfair to expect the parties in Northern Ireland to make judgments about the Bill without knowing the other proposals on offer. I am pleased that the Secretary of State spent some time this afternoon explaining the Command Paper on the ground rules for negotiations, which covered many of the issues that we consider important—such as decommissioning.

We recognise and support the considerable determination that the Secretary of State has shown in trying to produce a broadly acceptable package. It is widely recognised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's efforts have made a significant contribution to the search for some kind of agreement on the Bill. It was self-evident from the interventions made during the Secretary of State's speech that, as he indicated, it is impossible to please all the people all the time—but the Bill may be the best bet on offer in moving the peace process forward towards the negotiations on 10 June. That is why beginning negotiations on that date is so crucial, and why the elections are so important—I fully accept that they are not ideal—to ensure that the negotiations take place.

Given the opportunity, as we have already seen, many hon. Members would have chosen different routes to arrive at the current position. That fact is recognised in the amendment tabled by the official Unionist party—

Ms Mowlam: I am sorry—the Ulster Unionist party. I apologise profusely to the right hon. Gentleman for making such a serious error.

The reality is that we are on the road to talks by the method that has been proposed, so it is common sense for us to go down that road. Many pitfalls remain, not the least of which is the danger that the parties will use the election to become entrenched in their positions and to undermine the spirit of compromise and accommodation on which rests the eventual success of the negotiations. That would be regrettable, and the people of Northern Ireland would not thank anyone if the parties took such a stance. We appeal to the parties to think of the future and to embrace this opportunity in the spirit in which it has been presented.

We have supported the Government on Northern Ireland—not only on this Bill—because their approach, as the Bill shows, is based on agreements with the Irish Government: the Downing street declaration and the joint framework document. Our established policy of unity by consent is one option in those documents, and it provides a firm basis on which to build a consensus for a balanced settlement that can command the support and allegiance of both communities. We would try to build that consensus, just as the British and Irish Governments are attempting to do.

There are many anxieties about the influence of the House's political arithmetic. In some senses, those fears are understandable because political arithmetic has so often affected the politics of the island of Ireland and we must do all that we can to stop it happening again. I do not share the view that promises have been made—as many people have suggested in the past 24 hours—but it would perhaps be helpful to the House if the Government and parties made it clear that no deals or pacts have been made.

Bipartisan support means putting peace above party interests, but it does not mean simple acquiesence to whatever the Government say or do. We have had our differences with the Government over the past 18 months. We would have made progress differently in different spheres. Our approach would have included protecting the basic rights of both traditions, a different strategy for training and economic development and having fair employment and fair treatment guarantees in the public and private sectors.

We have also argued for the transfer of prisoners to Ireland—north and south—to ease problems of family contact. In particular, we are aware of the continuing controversy over the case of Patrick Kelly. We know of no reason why he cannot be transferred immediately.

We have proposed changes to improve community identification, which we think could operate in parallel with the Bill. Those changes would be important in building cross-cultural communication and support between the communities. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) has put together a consultation paper on policing, but we have yet to see the Government's contribution to that debate.

Our concrete proposals have greatly helped the process forward and we shall continue that help with constructive yet critical support for the Bill.

Had we shouted some of the differences in approach a little more openly—from the roof-tops, so to speak—it would have signalled to the parties that it might be worth holding back or procrastinating and hoping for a change in Government, although I know that not all the parties would have reacted in such a manner. I believe that such a stance would have been irresponsible, dishonest and in some senses damaging to the peace process. In future, however, as the general election nears, it will obviously be necessary for us to make our views clear in public more often than before.

The proposals in the Bill, and the Command Paper to which it refers, are the product of a long and tortuous process. As the Secretary of State said, we have gone through the Downing street declaration, the joint framework document, the decommissioning issue, the twin-track approach and Senator Mitchell's report. We can go back to the communiqué of 28 February and see how we have arrived at the position that we are in today.

It is clear that at times the Opposition would not have chosen to proceed in precisely the same way as the Government have done, but we are acutely aware of the difficulties that we face. We are equally aware that the only game in town is one that seeks to bring about meaningful negotiations which have a hope of success and to bring a new future based on peace and justice for Northern Ireland, the island of Ireland and these islands as a whole. That is what we want to see and that is why we shall support the Bill today.

At times in this arduous process, the stress has been on bringing the parties in from the fringes; at other times, it has been on building up the centre ground in Northern Ireland. In a sense, the processes that the Bill sets in train will offer an opportunity to do both. However, if Sinn Fein wants to be in the talks to represent its community, the restoration of the IRA ceasefire of August 1994 is essential. The British and Irish Governments are clear on that, and they have our full support. There is no excuse. A meaningful, inclusive process of negotiations is being offered and a date for the talks to begin has now been set.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): I thought I heard the hon. Lady say a moment ago that the Labour party would require the restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994. The Secretary of State said that he would require the Mitchell principles to be applied. Those are two very different things. Can we be assured that when the hon. Lady referred to the ceasefire of 1994 it was merely a slip of the tongue and that she will not allow Sinn Fein to come into the talks so long as it continues crucifying teenagers on wooden fences?

Ms Mowlam: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that question. My understanding of what the Secretary of State said this afternoon was that he would require a return to the ceasefire of August 1994. He went on to discuss in some detail the six principles and the proposals of the Mitchell commission. Let me make it clear that we agree with the ground rules for negotiations, which state clearly not only that there must be a return to the August 1994 ceasefire but that the Mitchell principles are an essential part of the process of participation in the negotiations of 10 June.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Much emphasis has been placed both by the hon. Lady and by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on a return to the ceasefire of August 1994, but that ceasefire was patently vulnerable and it failed. So without something much more solid than a failed ceasefire, there can be no prospect of success.

Ms Mowlam: Thank you very much. We have said clearly that the August 1994 ceasefire has to be reinstated and that the Mitchell six principles are an essential part of the development of the negotiations of 10 June. So it is clear that a process is being set in train of which the Mitchell six principles form part. I hope that that answers the hon. and learned Gentleman's question.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The six principles include decommissioning. Is the hon. Lady saying now that as well as accepting the six principles, the IRA must move immediately to decommissioning?

Ms Mowlam: I agree with the Secretary of State's analysis of the statement of August 1994 at the time of the ceasefire and of the Mitchell six principles as the procedure that we follow, as outlined in the ground rules. The statement said that decommissioning had to be addressed. Questions were put to him by hon. Members on both sides of the House who sought to find out the detail and when it would be addressed. He made it clear, and I agree that it is the only way in which we can move forward in any rational way, that the way to proceed was to get to 10 June, put the ground rules document on the table and see where the elected representatives of the Northern Ireland parties can move forward to.

Mr. Wilshire: Would the hon. Lady like to have a go at answering the question that I asked my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State? If the ceasefire is reinstated, does it have to be clearly declared as permanent and for ever before it is accepted as real?

Ms Mowlam: Members of Parliament, the Government and the Opposition have tried with the Bill and the ground rules document to put in place a mechanism to give the process momentum. Having sat through numerous statements to the House by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, the hon. Gentleman knows the difficulties that we have faced in the past 18 months in keeping the peace together and putting momentum back into the peace process. We went through definitions of "permanent" and a host of options. In the August 1994 ceasefire statement, in the ground rules document and in the Mitchell six principles, we have a mechanism and a process by which it is possible to move forward in the negotiations. I have clarified to Unionist Members that it will be for the parties in Northern Ireland to find a mechanism to move forward in negotiations. We think that that is a constructive way forward.

The House could try to define terms and put other statements in place. I hope that we are all engaged, and I perceive that the Bill and the ground rules for the negotiations are engaged, in seeking to provide some parameters to allow the parties in Northern Ireland—at present only those which are constitutionally elected and committed to the democratic process as the way forward—to participate in trying to obtain a settlement with which everyone can live. The hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) can keep coming back at me, and I shall with pleasure allow him one more intervention, but it is patently obvious from the Secretary of State's response that the hon. Gentleman will not move the process forward by trying to force the Secretary of State, me or any Northern Ireland Member into a definition in the House this afternoon without the benefit of the consultation that the ground rules document will give us the chance to undertake.

Mr. Wilshire: That is the longest way I have ever heard of saying, "No, it does not have to be permanent." So we now know the score. Both the Government and the official Opposition say that another temporary, tactical truce is acceptable and that on that basis they will let Sinn Fein-IRA into the talks. Has it not occurred to the hon. Lady that the talks will not start on that basis?

Ms Mowlam: If the hon. Gentleman wants to interpret comments in a way in which they clearly were not meant, he can do as he wishes and is entitled to do. I give the hon. Gentleman exactly the answer that I gave to his last question. The August 1994 ceasefire statement and the ground rules document address the principles and proposals in the Mitchell report, which addresses many of the questions that are crucial to building the trust and confidence between the parties in Northern Ireland that is needed to move the talks process forward. That is advantageous.

Mr. John D. Taylor: When the hon. Lady says that she will address the principles and the proposals, does she mean that she would implement them?

Ms Mowlam: The word "address"—a verb that has caused great debate and discussion among all of us in the past few months—is included in the principles and the proposals to enable the parties in Northern Ireland to find a mechanism by which "addressing" can take place. As the ground rules for the negotiations make clear, it has to take place at the beginning of the process. "Addressing" is a mechanism which permits the parties to consider these questions. That is what is stated. Those are the parameters that we hope will allow the elected representatives not to ask me the answer, but among themselves to find a mechanism with which they can all agree.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): This is an important point, which has been pursued with both the Government and the Opposition. It may be appropriate to say why the two Governments agreed to the wording in the communiqué and why the Opposition agree that there should be an unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire. We did not go further forward with the wording precisely because both Governments and both major political parties in the House want negotiations to proceed. We know how to stop the negotiations: it is by putting ever more conditions on them, which would serve the interests only of those in Northern Ireland who want to continue the killing. We are opposed to the killing. That is why that wording was used. That is why the British Government and the Opposition are agreed and why I hope that they will not get trapped into additional factors which would bring chaos to Northern Ireland.

Ms Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful clarification. I have made the point about the August ceasefire clear and I hope—so that the hon. Member for Spelthorne will not misquote my words—that I have also said that any participants who refuse to sign up to the six principles set out in paragraph 20 of the Mitchell report would forfeit their rights to continue in negotiations. I hope that that clarifies that point.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Mowlam: No, I will not take any more interventions. I have debated and discussed the point for some time, as did the Secretary of State, and I hope that that will allow us to move forward in the debate.

The process that the Bill will set up offers the opportunity for us to seek—[Interruption.] Are you very unhappy? Come on then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Before we proceed, I remind the House that all Members here are hon. Members. Perhaps pronouns could be left outside the Chamber.

Mr. Robinson: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for attempting to keep me happy. Is she aware that in the past few days it has been clearly shown in court that during the ceasefire the London bomber was preparing to cause devastation and death in this capital city? Is that the kind of ceasefire that the hon. Lady wants reinstated?

Ms Mowlam: We all condemn—and have done repeatedly—the murders of Inan Bashir and John Jefferies at Canary wharf and hope that the future will not see the deaths and injuries that we have seen in the past. A return to the August 1994 ceasefire would allow us to move forward—which is what I hope that everybody wants to do, rather than adding other preconditions to the process.

I wish to address a part of the legislation that the Opposition think is rather controversial, and we seek to amend it. In a speech in Coleraine last November, I said:

"It may be that some kind of electoral mechanism or index would help to bring all parties into the negotiations, but this must not lead to domination of the negotiations by one community nor be seen as a form of internal settlement."

At that time, like many others I was aware of the need to build trust and confidence to bring parties to the table, but the issue of decommissioning was becoming in some senses a logjam to moving the process forward. I was trying to identify an alternative approach.

I envisaged elections being a passport to the negotiations, and nothing more. The Bill, however, in clause 3 and schedule 2, would establish a forum with a deliberative function only and with no legislative, executive or administrative functions. The Opposition have urged that if a forum has to exist, its functions should be clearly subscribed in that way. That is to prevent any forum from becoming a blueprint or pilot for an assembly, which should come about only at the end of the negotiations if agreed as part of a balanced settlement dealing with the totality of relationships. It is also to prevent an elected forum from developing into an alternative negotiating arena.

We are puzzled, therefore, about why it is necessary for the body to have any decision-making powers. For pragmatic reasons, it may be necessary for decisions on the choice of the chair and the adoption of rules of procedure to occur on the basis of a vote. It appears to us, however, if we understand the remit and function of the forum correctly, that beyond those decisions the forum could proceed on a similar basis to the Forum for Peace and Reconciliation held in Dublin, in which issues were deliberated, understanding was increased, evidence was heard from outside groups and reports were published. Indeed, on 21 March the Prime Minister agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) that to that held in Dublin.

It was understood in the Dublin forum that if certain parties did not agree with the final reports, they would simply make their dissent clear by not signing them. Why must the forum in Northern Ireland operate on a different basis, unless its remit is not as we understand it from the Bill? We would welcome clarification from the Secretary of State on that point.

We would also welcome clarification of the process by which the list of parties in schedule 1 was arrived at. The Secretary of State mentioned earlier that parties were included on the list on the basis of complaints from parties that they were not on the initial list. Is there any mechanism for other parties to appeal so that they could be put on the list that is currently printed in schedule 1?

Also under schedule 1, the Secretary of State has the power to make provision by order in the event of an equality of quotients—a tie. Will he tell the House how he intends to make a judgment in that eventuality?

The Bill will give the Secretary of State many discretionary powers in relation to the process. We wish to learn, either later tonight or in the debate next week, how those powers will be exercised. Under schedule 2, there are proposals for the timing of the first meeting of the forum. We should be interested to ascertain how and when the Secretary of State will judge that the first meeting should take place.

The Secretary of State announced today that in his view there was insufficient support for a referendum to be held before or in parallel with the elections. It would be helpful if that position were clarified.

In clause 4, in relation to enactments, it is very unclear what the Secretary of State will be empowered to do. We would welcome clarification on that point and especially on its impact on decisions made in a referendum. Under clause 7, the Secretary of State has the power to restore the forum to life if it has been suspended. Will he assure the House that he would not exercise that power unless negotiations were also under way?

I know that the issue of the under-representation of women in political life in Northern Ireland is close to the hearts of many Members from Northern Ireland. Many of us would like to see greater participation by women. Does the Secretary of State have a view about how parties could be helped or encouraged to include more participation by women in the political process in Northern Ireland, in the list or by other mechanisms?

We also wish to learn how the Secretary of State intends to assist the parties and the public in Northern Ireland with the provision of information and other assistance in the course of the election campaigns. The Secretary of State stated in passing in the House this afternoon that literature would be provided. It would be useful if more information were given about how that process will work.

The issues that I have mentioned, and many others, are unclear from the Bill as it stands. We believe that the House would benefit from further clarification on those points. This is a deeply sensitive period in Northern Ireland. We are now operating against the volatile backdrop of parades and marches. We have proposed that the Secretary of State establish an independent commission to address that issue and to make recommendations to the Chief Constable to aid his decisions on the holding and routeing of marches. I am disappointed that as yet there has been no reaction to that suggestion as it is widely regarded as a sensible and practical step.

We have made it clear that we will support the Bill tonight. Elections in Northern Ireland are now a part of the process and the Government want and need to pass the legislation to make them possible. My right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) has already made it clear that he will not stand in the way of the legislation.

Mr. McNamara: I wonder whether my hon. Friend is in a position to answer the question about the contradiction between paragraph 24 of Cmnd. 3232 and the provisions in schedule 2 to the Bill. Under paragraph 24, as the Minister said earlier in answer to questions, a clear majority is needed in both communities; but schedule 2 contains provisions for a weighted majority.

Ms Mowlam: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. I hope that I made it clear—it may have been missed in the general discussion earlier—that we are concerned that the forum should function as a deliberative body. I talked about how it would gather evidence and I explained in some detail how the mechanisms by which the forum could reach conclusions could be achieved. I hoped that I was making it self-evidently clear that I did not think that a voting mechanism was the way to achieve that. I stated that I thought that there might be a case for that in respect of rules and procedure, but as my hon. Friend suggested, paragraph 24 of the ground rules is in the spirit of what I would like to be the mechanism within the forum for discussion between parties. I hope that that answers his question. I made it clear that we would amend the Bill on that point because it is causing us great concern.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and I am sorry to pursue the point, but the Command Paper states:

"in all cases . . . any decision taken will be supported by a clear majority in both the unionist and nationalist communities in Northern Ireland."

Rules and procedure will determine the agenda. Are we going to support an amendment which embodies the principle contained in the White Paper for those rules and procedures?

Ms Mowlam: I hear what my hon. Friend says and I agree with his point. I do not think that we disagree on this. I said that we need to amend schedule 2 in the spirit of the ground rules document as he quoted it. I hope that in the days ahead we shall be able to consider that.

In conclusion, as I have tried to argue, we agree with the Bill in principle. There are many aspects on which we would like further debate and there are parts that we would like to amend. In the end, however, we welcome the fact that the Government published the Bill, along with the ground rules for negotiations, because that gives most hon. Members a chance to examine in detail what is on offer—what they are buying into. We hope that that will give us a chance to achieve the objective that we all share of starting inclusive, meaningful negotiations on 10 June. Those talks are only the beginning of the real goal of securing through negotiation a new settlement that is balanced and fair and has the support of both communities.

5.2 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): It would be reasonable to argue that the appearance of this Bill should be regarded as a significant landmark in the process that started with the Downing street declaration, not least because the objective for more than three years has been the establishment of all-party negotiations with the opportunity that that provides for an agreement. One might therefore have expected the launch of the Bill to be accompanied by at least some rejoicing and a sense of achievement. I must confess, however, that that does not appear to have happened. Notwithstanding the tacit support of the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), I do not detect much, if any, enthusiasm for the Bill; nor do I detect much enthusiasm among some of those who are likely to take part in the negotiations to start their business.

It is perhaps not difficult to see why. Last night confirmed, on the assumption that it was indeed an IRA bomb, that the Provisionals are very far removed from being committed to exclusively peaceful methods and demonstrated that those who argued that the ceasefire was a de facto ceasefire were wrong. Optimism about the final agreement is in short supply perhaps because areas of disagreement clearly outweigh areas of common ground. Nevertheless, it is right that the process should go on—and right that it should go on without Sinn Fein.

As for the Bill and the elective process forum for discussion that it establishes, I will be brief. During the debate on the merits of the various electoral systems, I argued for an 18-constituency single transferable vote election. That debate is over. It is widely acknowledged that the elective process that the Bill offers is not ideal, but, as we know, none of the favoured options was likely to have commanded widespread support and the Government therefore had no choice but to come forward with an alternative that could lead to meaningful multi-party talks. No one may much like the elective process proposed in the Bill, but it is equally hard to understand how anyone could so dislike it that they would totally reject it, not least because it is the only way on offer that can lead to the desirable objective of extensive negotiations.

The elective process in the Bill can be likened to that freak of nature and extraordinary creature, the duck-billed platypus. Like the platypus, it is a peculiar mixture. Its pedigree is complex, its existence a challenge, it has a strange appearance and some peculiar features. Nevertheless, like the platypus, I expect that it will prove extremely functional.

I believe that we can be satisfied that the Bill will effectively achieve its purpose. I have questions, but I am generally satisfied with the provisions for elections, with the prescription for drawing participants for the negotiations from the elected delegates and with the power given to the Secretary of State to hold a referendum.

I welcome the changes in the ground rules that have emerged since the consultation paper of 15 March. Paragraph 4 of that paper corresponds to paragraph 4 of the final draft. I was glad to note that the controversial reference to a "new and more broadly based agreement" which would develop and extend the Anglo-Irish Agreement has been omitted. Those words pre-empted debate, anticipated a conclusion and were therefore out of place.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the replacement of those words by a eulogy to the framework document is unacceptable, as the framework documents are not acceptable to the community in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hunter: I find it acceptable because it was made clear at the launch of the framework documents and thereafter that they were not inclusive but a suggestion open to debate. Both Governments made it clear that alternative proposals were acceptable. I do not find the reference to the framework document objectionable.

Paragraph 7 of the final draft is also new. It clearly divides the negotiations from the forum. I appreciate that for some participants in the process that is an important point and I have no objection to it being made clear in the ground rules. I am not yet persuaded that those who regard the divide between forum and negotiations as less important can validly object to the divide being made in that way.

Paragraph 16 of the ground rules also appears for the first time in the revised draft. It demands:

"All participants in the negotiations will take part in good faith, seriously address all aspects of the agreed agenda, and make every effort to reach agreement."

I understand that the Irish Government were anxious that the ground rules should contain that demand and it is surely right and reasonable that it should be included. Above all, it makes nonsense of Sinn Fein's propaganda claim that the Government are not committed to the negotiations.

Greater participation by the political parties in each strand is the common theme to the additions to paragraphs 19, 20 and 21: in strand 1, through being consulted about liaison arrangements; in strand 2, through involvement in drawing up the procedural rules; in strand 3, through consultation, briefing and being able to put forward their views. I regard those alterations as healthy and acceptable. One cannot, however, ignore the related paragraphs 9, 13 and 14, and I share much of the concern that has been expressed by other hon. Members.

I continue to believe that paragraph 9, which deals with the participation of Sinn Fein, could cause difficulties. I listened carefully to my right hon. and learned Friend's comments, which were very reassuring. I hope that we will receive yet further reassurances during the winding-up speech. The day after a bomb has exploded in London, it may seem an academic exercise to express concern about the conditions under which Sinn Fein might be readmitted to negotiations, but there remains the possibility, however remote, that another ceasefire may be declared before 10 June.

We are aware that the ground rules impose as a condition to that readmittance the unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of 31 August. I agree with the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) that that ceasefire was wholly deficient. It was neither complete nor permanent. We have had rehearsed to us many times the fact that during those months the IRA's structures remained in place and that it recruited, trained, targeted and raised money. It also researched and developed home-made weapons and its members threatened, intimidated, tortured and murdered. At face value, it appears that the ground rules suggest that those are the conditions to which the IRA must return, and which are therefore acceptable. That cannot be the case.

Another difficulty is that one can imagine that some participants in the process may be more willing than others to accept the genuineness of a second ceasefire. Then, the problem is who arbitrates in that dispute. That is why I think it is unfortunate that there is not less ambiguity and greater clarity in paragraphs 13 and 14. Yes, the Secretary of State reminded us of the confidence-building measures mentioned in the communiqué of 28 February, and again quoted in the ground rules, but again we come back to the ambiguity of the words "to address" and precisely what that means, as well as the ambiguity in the meaning of the words "in accordance". That uncertainty is disturbing.

If I understood the hon. Member for Redcar correctly, I find it hard to expect at least 10 political parties to come to an agreement on an issue on which two Governments have failed to find agreement.

[Mr. Hunter]

On 21 March, the Prime Minister's reply to the hon. and learned Member for North Down was unambiguous, because he said that there must be parallel decommissioning and that it

"must proceed in parallel with the talks."—[Official Report, 21 March 1996; Vol. 274, c. 505.]

I hope that that is the case, but I am yet to be convinced that that is the Irish Government's understanding of the ground rules. Nevertheless, I welcome and support the Bill, although I continue to have that major reservation about one aspect of the ground rules.

5.12 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which unnecessarily introduces a wholly novel electoral system which is not properly thought out, contains unfairness and anomalies by introducing bogus political parties while omitting existing political parties and is complicated and designed to confuse the electorate."

The main provisions in the Bill are for elections and for a forum, in addition to referendums and negotiations. We welcome the provisions for elections. When I say we welcome them, I am referring, of course, to the genuine, authentic Ulster Unionist party, not the bogus Ulster unionist party that the Secretary of State has included in his Bill. The listing of bogus parties in the Bill is part of the reason why we have tabled the reasoned amendment.

The Government have moved, for the reasons that they have mentioned, to introduce an entirely novel electoral system. They had the choice of two systems on the statute book already, but they moved with great haste to introduce another one. List systems are not unusual—most of Europe votes by list systems—so there are list systems that could have been borrowed and used, but we do not even have a proper list system. I am not thinking in terms of the curious features of constituency lists and regional lists, although I shall refer to them again. The essence of a list system, in whatever variation it is adopted, is that it is a system of voting by reference to parties. If one is voting by reference to parties, one must have a clear legal basis for those parties and a form of regulation of the existence of parties and the use of party names. That is what happens in every other list system in the world where they are operated. There are procedures to regulate parties and the use of party names. That is foreign to British electoral law, which does not recognise the existence of parties. The Government have taken a novel step by moving in that direction; they have done so in a cack-handed and ineffective manner, which will cause difficulties.

It is all very well for the Secretary of State to say that it is simple for the elector to put an X against one name. We already have 30-plus names on the list, and that list may by no means be closed, so we will have the opportunity for confusion, particularly as some of the names used are not familiar even to me and my hon. Friends. They involve things that we have not heard of before. It may be that we have been inattentive and that things have come into existence without our appreciating them.

I was a little confused when I saw the name of the No Going Back group, and wondered whether it was the group with a similar name that exists in the Conservative party. Members of the Liberal Democrat party will appreciate, however, that there is a serious issue involved. If, in the European elections, a significant number of electors—some 10,000 in that case—cast their votes in a way that, in all probability, by far the greater number did not intend because of the similarity of names on a ballot paper that was comparatively short and where the name of the candidate was in clear, bold type and the party name in quite small type, will not the risk of confusion be greater if candidates' names do not appear, although I think that they should, and all we have is a long list of names of parties, many of which will be unfamiliar? That is the problem.

If we are to have a list system, either the Government should introduce a proper statutory scheme for the regulation of parties and the use of party names or, as they said they intended to do when they brought out their first paper, they should have a mechanism to regulate the parties by a statutory list. Having made that suggestion, however, they retreated from it and opened the door to a number of others. The proposed process should be looked at seriously. Because we consider it a matter of considerable importance, we have tabled a reasoned amendment calling for re-examination.

There are a number of possible solutions. I shall not go into all of them now, but the use of deposits could be one way of resolving the problem. When the issue came up originally, it was said that there would be no need for deposits on candidature because there would be statutory regulation of names and only genuine parties would take part. Now, however, independents, or a group of people, who decide to form a political party can put themselves up provided they can find two persons to stand in a particular constituency so as to get them on the constituency list. Those persons will then be entitled to the free postal delivery of election communications. The likelihood is that that will be a considerable temptation—not just to the 30-odd names on the list, but to others as well. It is to restrain people from exploiting the public service in that way that deposits are used in British electoral law. There is every reason to extend the use of deposits to the proposed elections.

Mr. Beith: May I put it to the hon. Gentleman that someone whose intention was to confuse would be ready to raise the money to do so and invent some variant on the Ulster Unionist party just as the variant Literal Democrat was invented by someone who soon found the money for the deposit?

Mr. Trimble: I take the right hon. Gentleman's point and I appreciate that my suggestion is not watertight. We need the procedures that exist in countries that use list systems whereby either only those who have statutorily registered names are used or people can challenge the misuse of a name. There would then be some form of judicial process whereby those matters could be resolved. That would be by far the better way to proceed, but time is short.

Mr. Maginnis: Is it not the case that, as there is a separate election in each constituency, under the right hon. Gentleman's proposal there would be a need for a deposit in each constituency? That would place a considerable burden, over 18 constituencies, on any individual wanting to pervert the course of the election by nominating two people under his name—an independent or whatever it may be—in each constituency.

Mr. Trimble: My hon. Friend's point is well made: these are the ways in which the deposit requirement could be made effective. It is important for us to look at that.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Perverting the election in one constituency could have an impact overall, and it is no more acceptable that someone who can raise a deposit for one of the 18 constituencies should get off in that way, as was the case with the Liberal Democrats. Would it not be better if there were a requirement to have a significant number of assentors to the nomination as well as a deposit? We put that proposal to the Northern Ireland Office.

Mr. Trimble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that suggestion—it is a good idea. They are the sorts of things that should be done. We should be examining ideas of that nature, and the ones that I have mentioned, as a way of restraining the abuse of the system that has been adopted here. I hope that there will be an openness on the part of the Government, come Monday and Tuesday, to look at this seriously.

By putting forward our proposals, we are not trying to wreck the opportunity that exists for the people of Northern Ireland to express their views at the ballot box—we want elections and we want them to take place in a coherent manner and in a way that will reflect the wishes of the people.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's concerns about the minutiae. Is he aware that, in January, some of us went to observe the elections in Palestine? In the city of Gaza, where I was stationed, the ballot paper contained 92 candidates and people had to make 12 choices. However, 94 per cent. of the people turned out and voted and chose, against many urgings of the large parties, a balanced assembly. Is it not better to focus on enthusing people for the process of democracy so that they choose wisely rather than get involved in the minutiae of one system or another?

Mr. Trimble: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that suggestion and for pointing out how successful the elections were in Palestine. He said that there were 92 names on the ballot paper. I hope that the Government Front Bench listened carefully to what he said. That example shows that it is possible to have a large number of names on a ballot paper, which would enable the provision that we have asked the Government to make—to put the names of candidates on the ballot paper. That would reduce the danger of confusion arising from misleading names. As we are dealing with constituency-based elections—where there will be only up to five names on the list of any one party—it would be possible to put the names of all the candidates standing in that constituency on the ballot paper.

Mr. Robert McCartney: I think the hon. Gentleman would agree that there is a world of difference between voting in Israel, where the list system and all its refinements has been a feature for some time—

Mr. Beith: The Palestinians had never voted before.

Mr. McCartney: I am speaking about the Israeli elections. As I understand it, they have had a list system.

I shall move on to another point raised by the hon. Gentleman—why there may be some smaller parties that have no political validity and are entirely new. There are some small parties, including my party, that have managed to get someone elected to the House. They are now faced with having to field not one, but two, candidates in every constituency in order to get a Province-wide vote. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that small parties should be penalised and perhaps excluded by reason of a deposit system in every constituency?

Mr. Trimble: I point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that the example given earlier by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) referred to Palestine, not Israel. In Palestine, they do not have the same experience of using list systems as Israel. Israel is not a good advertisement for list systems because the way the system operates there has not been beneficial to the development of democracy or to the peace process.

The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the problem for his party. I am happy to distinguish between his position and that of other small parties. My use of the term "bogus parties" was not by any means intended to refer to the hon. and learned Gentleman and his hon. Friends. I appreciate that if he wants to field candidates in all the constituencies, he will experience the difficulties that inevitably exist for smaller parties. I was once a member of a small party; and I am familiar with that experience.

We have to have a system that will do something to whittle out those groups that have no real support, particularly as one of the features of the list system—this is something that should be of interest to all hon. Members—is that it will shred the Unionist vote and shred the vote generally. This is exactly the feature that mars Israeli politics.

The single transferable vote system would have allowed people to express preferences and would have allowed votes to consolidate in a way that would have produced a much more coherent result. As the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) said, when and if we get to 10 June and find ourselves with 10-plus parties there, as well as two Governments, it will be much more difficult for the talks to move forward in a positive way, particularly when we bear in mind—as we do—the experience of 1992 when the efforts that we made at that time did not develop in a positive way.

I shall now consider some other areas in which we have reservations about this operation. The Command Paper entitled "Northern Ireland: Ground Rules for Substantive All-Party Negotiations" has been mentioned. I am sorry to see that the preamble contains statements that would mislead people who are ill informed and not familiar with the background. I refer to the phrase "following consultation".

The paper was originally produced with no consultation whatsoever and some small improvements have since been made. However, it still contains a scheme that we do not find acceptable. It is simply wrong to talk about this paper containing a broadly acceptable set of rules. It does not. It is largely a reproduction of the set of rules—in so far as there were rules—that operated in the 1992 inter-party talks and which largely contributed to the failure of the inter-party talks in 1992.

The Secretary of State may recall that the only times when we had any genuine progress in the 1992 talks was when we departed from the rules that are the basis of these rules. I think there lies a lesson that we want to do things better than we did in 1992. We do not want to exclude the consideration of issues. The paranoia that has been displayed by some nationalist politicians on this matter is quite wrong.

We are quite prepared to address the whole range of issues, but we want to do it in a more fruitful way than we did in 1992. This set of ground rules, by leaning so much on the experience of 1992, is likely to be an obstacle, particularly as we find commentators in Dublin stating that these are now immutable and unchangeable. The Secretary of State is shaking his head. I hope that this will be made clear during the debate; we are not dealing with an immutable set of rules, but something that is still open for development and consultation, because we wish to see it develop. We wish to see changes towards the more fruitful ideas that we have explored.

There is reference in the ground rules to the unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994. I shall not repeat the points that have been made in this regard as they have so ably been made by other hon. Members, particularly the hon. Member for Basingstoke and by the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) in his intervention. The ceasefire of August 1994 was not a genuine ceasefire. We cannot be content with the restoration of that equivocal operation and the matter must move on to more secure ground as rapidly as possible.

We should focus our attention on paragraph 13 of the Command Paper, which is in fact a paragraph taken from the communiqué issued by the Prime Minister and the Irish Prime Minister on 28 February. It is that joint communiqué that we should regard as the basis on which to strengthen and make genuine the ceasefire. That is the basis on which we should proceed. The quotation, in paragraph 13, of the communiqué is followed by a couple of paragraphs of turbid Anglo-Irishese, which do not add to the paragraph's meaning and are best ignored. We are best concentrating on the communiqué itself. If we follow that course, matters become clear.

There has been much discussion about "address" and what it means, along with other matters of that nature. There was complete lack of clarity in that discussion. The starting point is the beginning of the communiqué, which states that "all participants"—I assume that "all participants" will individually have to indicate their position—

"would need to make clear at the beginning"— that is unequivocal, because "at the beginning" means at the beginning, and that is the first item—

"their total and absolute commitment to the principles of democracy and non-violence."

In my view the key phrase is "total and absolute commitment". That is "total and absolute commitment" to the Mitchell principles, which include the principle of and the renunciation of the use of force, as well as the ending of "'punishment' killings and beatings". That was the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross).

"total disarmament of all paramilitary organisations"

The Mitchell principles go far beyond the ceasefire of August 1994. It is the Mitchell principles that constitute the key. Similarly, total and absolute commitment to the principles is the key. There must be a procedure, and it must be sorted out well before 10 June. It is not sufficient, as the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) said, to leave matters until 10 June for the participants who then turn up. The result would be a shambles. We need, well before 10 June, to have a clear agreement on how a total and absolute commitment will be expressed. That must be done in clear and unequivocal manner.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Is the hon. Gentleman able to think of any good reason why, in relation to absolute commitment to the principle of democracy in Northern Ireland and the need to address at the same stage decommissioning proposals, the words "need to" should be replaced by "must"?

Mr. Trimble: Is there any difference? I am not sure that there is. The "need to make clear . . . total and absolute commitment to the principles of democracy" suggests "must". It has to happen. It has to happen in a clear and unequivocal way. To make a total commitment to the principles of non-violence, including the disbandment of all paramilitary organisations, means more than uttering a form of words or signing one's name on a declaration, as is done in local government. It means following that commitment through with actions. That is made clear by the sixth principle, of ending paramilitary killings and beatings. The principles are not merely stated, because they must be followed by action. Therefore, there must be agreement. That is the significance of "address". There must be agreement on how actions will take place.

We must not expect actions to take place instantly. We expect that they will proceed, as the Prime Minister said, alongside talks. However, one expects to see at the beginning, or as the communiqué states, "at that stage", clear commitments on the actions that will follow to demonstrate that there is in truth a total and absolute commitment. It is essential that, well before 10 June, there is a discussion between the constitutional parties and the two Governments on the exact procedures that we shall follow on 10 June so that we can be sure that there is a commitment, that it is given in a clear way and that we do not find things disappearing in a cloud of obfuscation and Anglo-Irishese.

There is certainly one matter that the Governments must address urgently. One of the Mitchell principles is the need for disbandment or decommissioning to take place to the satisfaction of an independent commission. As the Mitchell principles state, that commission must have a clear legal basis. If any decommissioning of weapons is taking place, those who are giving up weapons have to be given a degree of immunity from criminal prosecution for possession of the weapons that they are surrendering. That requires legislation. My colleagues and I have drawn attention to that over a long period.

I understand that the Government have prepared legislation. I would welcome a response when the Minister replies. I was given to believe that it was intended that such proposed legislation would be introduced at the same time as the Bill, and that the two measures would proceed through the House at roughly the same time. Such legislation has not yet appeared. I should like an explanation for the delay.

Similarly, I would welcome an indication of the position on equivalent Irish legislation. If anything, that is more important. If decommissioning is to take place, the bulk of it will take place in the Republic of Ireland. That is where the bulk of the weapons and bombs are. We need to have legislation to enable the international commission to inspect and verify decommissioning and the limited and tightly circumscribed amnesty that will run alongside it.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Stratford (Mr. Taylor) and I raised these matters, along with my hon Friend the Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis), with the Irish Government on 11 March—more than five weeks ago. We underlined the necessity for prompt action by the Irish Government. Since then, we have heard nothing. The Government should tell us this evening what success they have had in encouraging the Irish Government to bring forward the necessary legislation. That legislation must be in place before 10 June so that the commitments and undertakings that must be given on 10 June, along with undertakings relating to parallel decommissioning, are not frustrated.

I hope that there is no thought on the part of people in government that they might let Sinn Fein-IRA off the hook by not having the necessary legislation in place so that decommissioning cannot take place, even if that is what is wanted. I hope that there is no support lurking for that. It will be demonstrated that there is no support for that by bringing forward the necessary legislation as speedily as possible.

Mr. William Ross: My hon. Friend will be well aware that IRA-Sinn Fein say constantly that there must be forensic examination of any weapons that are ever surrendered. Will my hon. Friend dwell for a moment on the reasons for that? Is it that the IRA might be trying to hold back some weapons that have been identified? If it handed over some weapons, it could say, "That is all." If there were to be no forensic examination, there would be no means of identifying the weapons that had been used.

Mr. Trimble: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It will be interesting to hear what the Government have to say. There must be a limited amnesty when it comes to the possession of weapons that are decommissioned—it must be tightly limited. For the reasons that my hon. Friend has set out, we must be careful about conceding to absence of examination. The object of the exercise is to ensure that weapons held by paramilitary organisations are decommissioned and that there is total disarmament of those organisations. The purpose of the verification procedure is to ensure that we achieve that objective. In that context, forensic examination is something that we should bear in mind.

The issue of a forum has given rise to unnecessary controversy. It should not be regarded as controversial. Indeed, it should be understood as a key element that will, I hope, make a fruitful contribution to the process that lies ahead. It is necessary to have a body in which public debate can take place. There will not be confidence in the community in Northern Ireland in a process that operates solely behind closed doors, in secrecy. If confidence is to be built in the community, there has to be a public element, a degree of transparency, which public debate will give.

Furthermore, the public debate itself will be fruitful in terms of possibly changing the approach, or developing the approach, of the participants. The effect of engagement in debate on those who are there is not to be overlooked. That, presumably, is why we treasure this institution. Surely we believe that the debates that we have in the Chamber make a contribution to our own thoughts as well as to the public view. We should not, therefore, treat so dismissively having a similar debating opportunity in Northern Ireland.

It was never part of the intention of my hon. Friends and others who put forward this proposal—we are happy to acknowledge the contribution to the thinking that we have received from others such as the Alliance party and the Democratic Unionist party in this matter—that the body to be created would in some way control and determine the negotiations. I find it amazing that anyone should think that that would be the case. Exactly the same people will be in the forum and in the negotiations. Exactly the same parties will be there. The decisions that are taken by agreement in one will be replicated in the other. If there is agreement in the negotiations, I expect there to be similar agreements in the forum. How could it be otherwise if the same people are in both channels? If there is disagreement in one area, I expect the disagreement will be replicated elsewhere. I cannot envisage that the same people in two channels will instruct themselves in one area how to behave in the other. That is simply not a situation that we need worry about.

I hope that the negotiations will be fruitful. I also hope that the debate in the forum will be fruitful. The additional advantage of the forum is that it can take evidence from the public. It can involve the public in the process. That is something that I hope the public and interest groups in the community in Northern Ireland will do.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): With regard to consulting the public, does the hon. Gentleman expect that the forum will be confined to one location or that it will be a roving commission going from community to community and holding meetings in those different communities?

Mr. Trimble: I very much hope that that option is available to it. Whether it is depends to a certain extent on whether the Secretary of State is prepared to make the resources available for that to happen. I hope that that will involve not just a matter of going within the community in Northern Ireland, but going outside Northern Ireland to take evidence from people elsewhere in the United Kingdom or even in the Republic of Ireland as well. That could be a beneficial exercise and one should not decry the opportunities that are there.

I am happy to see that some commentators in the Dublin press are beginning to appreciate that there may be merit in the operation of the forum. I am thinking of articles in the Irish Independent today by Dr. Maurice Hayes and in The Irish Times by Mary Holland, both of whom are beginning to appreciate that the forum can make a useful contribution. I hope that it will, and I hope that the process on which we are engaged will be moved forward in a positive way, but we must be realistic about it. In being realistic, we must acknowledge that what happened on 9 February and subsequently did happen and has an important bearing on the process.

I appreciate why some hon. Members focus so much on Sinn Fein, but the indisputable evidence is that there is not a commitment to peaceful means within Sinn Fein and the IRA. We have talked about the Mitchell principles. One of the Mitchell principles is to oppose any effort to use force to influence the course of negotiations. What on earth was the bomb of 9 February if it was not an attempt to use force to influence the course of negotiations? What on earth was the bomb in London last night, set off just before this debate, if it was not the use of force as an attempt to influence the course of negotiations?

Let us have no illusions about this. The opportunity is there for Sinn Fein-IRA if they are to have a road-to-Damascus conversion between now and 10 June. If they are to realise the error of their current ways, the opportunity is there, but let us be realistic about it. It would be false to build too many hopes on that. The likelihood is that, when 10 June comes, should Sinn Fein arrive at the talks, which it very well may not, the duty of most of us would probably be to remind it of the need to make this absolute and total commitment to the Mitchell proposals and to ensure that it is shown the door if that is not the case. It will be for Sinn Fein to decide whether it takes that road. The principles are there and it would be quite wrong for us to distort or change them.

There is also a positive opportunity here. During the past 18 months, the refusal of Sinn Fein-IRA to demonstrate good faith prevented any political progress. Their refusal to move on the issue meant that nothing happened. Now, in the future, should they continue to fail to demonstrate good faith, their refusal will affect only their own position. The process is there and can be carried on by the other parties.

Sir Patrick Mayhew indicated assent.

Mr. Trimble: I am glad to see the Secretary of State nodding in agreement with that. That opportunity is there for those who are committed to democracy and peaceful means. Those who are committed to democracy and peaceful means have an obligation to take this opportunity and to move forward even if it means leaving behind those small groups that are mired in terrorism. That is what we must look forward to in June; to carry forward the process in a way that will benefit the people of Northern Ireland—the 85 to 90 per cent. of the people of Northern Ireland who do not support the use of violence and who have enjoyed, yes, the absence or relative absence of violence during the last couple of years and who look forward to the creation of political institutions. That is what we must do. It is the duty of all those who believe in democracy to proceed in that way.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): It always amazes me how Members of the House who have never fought an election in Northern Ireland, who visit it only occasionally, know the mind of the people of Northern Ireland. It simply amazes me. If I stood up in the House and told the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) that I knew what her constituents were thinking, she would tell me to get lost, perhaps in stronger language that I would not use in the House. The people of Northern Ireland resent greatly that Members of the House can investigate their minds and their thinking and tell the House authoritatively what they are thinking.

The hon. Lady asked what would be the difference between this forum and the forum in Dublin. The difference is that this will be a democratic forum. People will go not because they were chosen by the Government, but because people made the choice for them to go. That is why. We are talking about democracy. We are not talking about rigged assemblies to obtain the kind of decision that the hon. Lady thinks should be made.

We are also told that the people of Northern Ireland are keen on certain things. The Secretary of State is very good at telling us that in Northern Ireland. We listen to him often and he seems also to get inside the brains of the Ulster people. I remind him that his party ran a candidate in the European Parliament election and he canvassed for her. I beat that candidate by 155,000 votes and she forfeited her deposit, so evidently he did have the mind of the people of Northern Ireland.

There are great differences in the Conservative party. Some members of the Conservative party do not want their candidates to run in this election. I was arguing with its chairman today the right of Conservative party members to run in this election. We welcome the fact, and we hope that they do run. Then I was told by him, "If they do run, they will never get to the negotiating table because we are doing the negotiations." So they will be discriminated against and not get to the negotiating table. So there is one party already outside the negotiations, and that is the Conservative party.

Mr. Wilshire: The hon. Gentleman urged us not to read too much into the minds of the people whom he understands better, but I ask him not to read too much into the comments of individual members of my party, because not necessarily does one person speak for everybody else, not even the chairman.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman includes the chairman and the Secretary of State in that. I shall leave members of the Conservative party to have within their ranks their own debate about that. I welcome the fact that Conservative candidates can stand at the election, but regret that the Labour party, which seems to know about Northern Ireland, will not be fielding candidates.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does not the hon. Gentleman think that it is a rather unfortunate departure from traditional democratic principles when the Secretary of State can decide in advance of an election which parties are allowed to contest it?

Rev. Ian Paisley: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the amendments that my party has tabled, he will have the answer to that point. I hope that he votes for those amendments. The proof of the pudding is in the eating. All the parties in the House and all the parties that were called to the negotiating table made strong representations on various issues that we are not satisfied about. Someone asked how I know. I tested the people of Northern Ireland a little over 18 months ago on the Downing street declaration. I ran an election on it and topped the poll with more than 163,000 votes, so I know something about what people in Northern Ireland think on these issues.

The Bill exposes the Government's view that we must undermine the ordinary elective process and thus weaken real democracy in Northern Ireland. The way forward for Northern Ireland is real democracy. We must not weaken or dilute it, but we must support it and believe in it. I am one who said that we should get as many as possible of the smaller parties to the table, but not by rigging an election. We should get them to the table, if they can make it, by the democratic process. We also put it to the Secretary of State that the number of people contesting the election could be limited simply by asking every candidate wishing to stand to produce at least 200 assentors. If every candidate could get 200 names, they would have at least a little chance.

I put that to one of the smaller parties, and it said: "Would we have to go out and canvass so many names? We couldn't do that. We couldn't get them." In that case, their candidates should not be standing. Look at what those parties will cost the Government, with their manifestos, all delivered free, the printing of ballot papers, and so on. The Government should pay attention to what was said and do something to ease the problem. That does not mean that I am against independents standing, but they should have to put down a deposit.

When the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) stands, he has to put down a deposit. If he goes into another constituency, he has to put down a deposit. There is no easy way in the election, and one must be prepared to lose the deposit. Some good men have lost their deposits in the past and eventually gained an ear in the House. That is the way of democracy, and we must stick to that.

We see in the Bill a rigging of the system. We also see a great conspiracy to weaken the forum when it is elected, and that is a tragedy. I regret what the hon. Member for Redcar said, because the forum will be a marvellous opportunity for the parties in Northern Ireland to express their views in the light of day, not behind closed doors. People could test in public, through debate, what their views were. I have never heard of some of the people on the list. I do not know who they are. I do not know what they are. In fact, they themselves hardly know. The parties just thought of a name and got it in just in time. Now they will be faced with the difficulty of finding two candidates for one constituency. It would be good if they could get together if elected and discuss those matters in public.

Why is the House against a forum that will have an opportunity to discuss in public matters that are important to the people of Northern Ireland? Why does the House want to cast away the opportunity that the forum could give? After all, the people at the negotiating table will be the leaders and representatives of the people in the forum, so there will not be such a great difference between what is said at the negotiating table and what is said in the forum.

If we do not have the forum, the election will be in vain, because we shall be allowed only three negotiators, and three people sitting behind, and that will apply to the small parties as well. Irrespective of whether someone gets 30 per cent. or 15 per cent. of the vote, they are reduced to the size of the smallest party. The only way to balance that democratically is to have the forum and to have it working properly. Why should it not work and vote? What is so wrong with voting? We do it all the time in this House.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it would be far better to have a forum/assembly/Stormont that was the result of all-party agreement rather than impose one, when it quite clearly would not have the full confidence of the majority of people in Northern Ireland?

Rev. Ian Paisley: I shall correct the hon. Gentleman. We are not talking about a new Stormont or a new assembly, and neither was anyone who made this proposal. We all said that the forum would not have any legislative or administrative power. It would be the forum in which Ulster people could say what they wanted.

The Government have been meeting representatives of Sinn Fein and the IRA, and the so-called loyalist paramilitary groups, behind closed doors time and again. The ordinary people of Northern Ireland ask, "When are we going to have a say?" The only way in which they can have a say is through the forum. It is their negotiating body, reflecting their views. It is ridiculous for the hon. Gentleman to suggest that we would try to set up some new Stormont in this way. The forum will have no power whatever. We do not want it to have any power. We have made it perfectly clear to our people that they need not look upon themselves as Members of Parliament in embryo. They are nothing of the sort. They are just delegates to their negotiating forum.

Dr. Godman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree with the view voiced a few minutes ago by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), the leader of the Ulster Unionist party, that the forum should be given the means to allow it to meet outwith Belfast, elsewhere in the United Kingdom, even in Dublin?

Rev. Ian Paisley: We have said that the forum can meet in any part of the United Kingdom. No doubt, if it wanted to go to Dublin, it would. I would not go with it, by the way, if it did. I think that it is in the ground rules that there is no restriction on where it can meet.

Mr. Peter Robinson: The Government supplied the political parties in Northern Ireland with a paper during the consultative process, in which they laid out clearly the role that such a forum would have, and proposed that it would be able to meet in various places and in various forms. I know of no party that has objected to that proposal.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Another proposal was that committees of the forum should sit like Select Committees of this House and investigate problems, which are bound to arise during negotiations. We have a problem at the moment, for example, in local government. Surely there should be a committee to examine local government in Northern Ireland.

We have many problems. The forum should continue with its work, and then feed the results to the negotiators. That, surely, would lead to consensus—the consensus that has already been achieved by committees. There is much work to be done. The main thrust of the policy of both the SDLP and the Dublin Government, however, has been that the forum is not really important. It is a case of telling people, "Stand for election and then go home; we do not want you, and we are sorry that we ever heard of you."

I resent the part of the Bill that refers carefully to making

"provision for elections in Northern Ireland for the purpose of providing delegates".

Why does it not say "for the purpose of electing a forum from which delegates shall be drawn to participate in the negotiations"? The Government want to put the forum down. The trouble is that people fear that there will be a Unionist majority on it—and there will. Most people who are sent to this House, under its own rules, are Unionists; those who do not like that will have to lump it. I once said to Mrs. Thatcher, "You have been elected by the people of the land. Millions hate you, but you are still the Prime Minister. You hate me, but I have been elected by the people, and I will speak for the people." It is not possible to do anything else.

What is wrong with the people of Ulster having their say in an election, and subsequently in debate? They have no powers. They cannot legislate; they can only give an opinion, having established that opinion through select committees. Moreover, there is to be a referendum, so that the result of all the discussions can be put to the people. If that result is not passed by the forum, it will never be passed by the people of Northern Ireland. That is the litmus test. If the result cannot get past the forum, we can forget about it.

If the House is foolish enough to say goodbye to the forum's opinion and call a referendum, and if the result of the discussions is overwhelmingly rejected, we shall find ourselves in an even worse position. Why is the House so adamant about de-horning the forum? It should be able to deliberate and vote. I am glad that it is to be allowed to appoint its own chairman; there was a big fight about that. I think that some Ministers thought that they should chair the forum, but subsequently realised that that was not on, and that we were entitled to choose our own chairman. It would be possible to have weighted majorities. The European Parliament has weighted majorities, and there is nothing undemocratic about that.

I am sorry that the Government wish to neuter the assembly. Clause 1 spells out the purpose of the elections: they are to provide "delegates from among whom participants in negotiations may be drawn."

It does not, however, spell out the fact that the purpose of the elections is to provide the people of Northern Ireland with a genuine stake in a matter from which they have most to lose or gain.

Clause 2 deals with the first task that must be undertaken immediately after the elections. I note that the Government intend to invite negotiating teams to participate. Where will those teams come from? They will come from the forum—but the forum will not meet. That is the first thing that must happen: the forum must meet, and it must meet before 10 June. It cannot be muzzled; it must be heard, and it will be heard.

Unfortunately, the Government have already fixed the meeting place for the negotiations. They must do that, because they spend so much money on making rules—and on giving Gerry Adams a beautiful suite of offices with his name on the door. Dick Spring has an even bigger suite. He said that his table was not as big as the Secretary of State's, and that there must be equality. I was given a room, which I have never seen; so was my party, and so was the Ulster Unionist party. Stormont used to be anathema to the republicans, but that is no longer the case. There are those wonderful rooms, and the small parties that have told us that they will never give up their weapons—that they will never hand in one gun—are welcome. The leader's name is on the door, and they all sit there in state.

Let me remind the House that the loyalist paramilitaries take the same line as Sinn Fein: they refuse to decommission. I, for one, will not sit down with them until they abide by the Mitchell principles and start handing in the weapons that have committed murder, just like the weapons of Sinn Fein. If hon. Members think that Unionists can be bullied into sitting down with a bunch of gunmen, they had better be disillusioned immediately. We cannot negotiate with those who are killing people and brutalising Northern Ireland.

That is still happening today. I am amazed that the House does not realise what is happening in our Province. A young Roman Catholic boy, Martin Docherty, was actually crucified: spikes were put into his hands and feet, and he was left bleeding by the IRA. Then hon. Members ask me to sit down with the IRA's representatives, and to talk about peace. That cannot be done, and no self-respecting politician will do it.

That is why I have asked the Secretary of State how he will prove that IRA representatives are genuine. Even the deputy leader of the Ulster Unionist party said that he was convinced that the ceasefire was real: his gut had told him that. No doubt his stomach has now taught him another lesson—that the ceasefire was not real. The Secretary of State said that he "perceived" that it was real, and was making a working assumption. His working assumption was balderdash; it was not "working" at all. At the very time when he was saying that, churches were being burnt on both sides of the community. Orange halls were being burnt, and the police were being attacked: 590 petrol bombs were thrown at them. Some peace.

Beatings were also being carried out. The House should ensure that no representative sits at the negotiating table until those dreadful beatings have stopped. They are an outrage, but they are happening repeatedly, and not just one side is responsible. This year alone, the loyalists have already carried out 33 punishment beatings and the republicans 45—but they have a room at Stormont with their leader's name on it, and they are sitting negotiating with the Government. What sort of democracy is that? Since the ceasefire, the IRA has carried out more than 210 such attacks, while the loyalists have carried out 125. What about the Lurgan man, Mr. Maguire, who was attacked by the IRA on 12 April? Mr. Maguire, a grandfather, was covered in petrol and then set on fire. We can have nothing to do with people who do those things, or with their spokesmen.

The Secretary of State promised that he would first ask the leaders of all the parties to make a declaration—he was not entering into negotiations—that they were tied to the Mitchell principles, and would proceed to carry them out. The Mitchell programme is decommissioning: the arms must go. What has Martin McGuinness told us? He has said that no gun will ever be surrendered by the IRA, and Gerry Adams has said the same. The Protestant paramilitaries have also said that no guns will be surrendered.

What will the Government do on 10 June? Will they say, "Affirm where you stand," or will they invite everyone to come to the table? There seems to be a difference between what is in the joint communiqué and what the Government are saying. I hope that the worst fears of the Ulster people will not be realised and that the Government will be firm and say that no one can come to the negotiating table until he has signed up to and proved by his actions that he will abide by the principles of the Mitchell report. Only on that basis can there be satisfaction. If there are guns on the table, under the table and outside the door, people cannot negotiate freely, because they will always be under threat.

I hope that we can amend the Bill and put right some matters that are entirely wrong. The Bill cannot ever be perfect, but at least it gives the people of Northern Ireland the opportunity to put a mark beside the names of those whom they want to represent them at the table. Some people think that we do not want talks or negotiations. Why should we not? The part of the community that I represent has suffered most. We have a strong case for saying that we must get these talks going and that they must succeed. We have the motivation to get them for our people, but they must be on a proper basis. I have gone to all the talks, even though other parties did not go. I was at the Atkins talks and I went to the assembly when the Ulster Unionists would not. I have tried to put my case.

Mr. John D. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman is wrong: it was the SDLP that boycotted it. We were present.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The right hon. Gentleman's party was out of the assembly twice. It went in and out like a yo-yo. The Ulster Unionists came to the assembly only because a Westminster election had been called. They knew that if they boycotted the assembly, they would not do well in the election.

Rev. Martin Smyth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. One of the assembly's remits was to prepare a report on how Northern Ireland should be governed. Because others were not prepared to do that work, we abstained until they became sensible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair is not adjudicating on any of this.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I do not propose to go into why they did not attend the assembly, but it had nothing to do with what the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) has said.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Read the record.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I have read the record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This has nothing to do with the Bill.

Rev. Ian Paisley: You took the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and it was not made by me.

If the basis of the negotiations is not right, the outcome will not be right. I plead with the House to let the people of Northern Ireland speak. Make the changes that need to be made in the Bill. I hope that the Government will not ramstam the Bill on a guillotine to get it through the House, but that there will be adequate time to discuss it. I emphasise that, and I am glad that the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), the leader of the Ulster Unionists, also made that point. We are not here to wreck the Bill. We want an election and it was my party that originally proposed one. But it must be on a basis that will lay a foundation not of sand but of rock, so that a solid outcome will result for all the people of Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann spoke about the method of the election. I was told by the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister that if the parties could reach broad agreement about the method of the election, the Government would accept it. I thought that the Government wanted us to do that, so I went to my party's opposite, the SDLP. We had big differences, but we sat down and found that we could bridge the gap by having a list system. We went to all the smaller parties and they also agreed to that, but the Ulster Unionists and the Alliance party said no. We did our best to get broad agreement.

The leader of the Ulster Unionists eulogised the single transferable vote system. I hope that he will suggest STV for elections to this House, because that would enable Unionists to express themselves without splitting the vote and fracturing Unionism. Some seats in Northern Ireland are not fought by the DUP or the Ulster Unionists because if the Unionist vote was divided, the republicans would get the seats. If STV operated for elections to the House, the numbers would be different on both sides.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): The legislation is totally unnecessary because it purports to pave the way for all-party negotiations. But such negotiations could and should have started a long time ago, and could have been based on earlier electoral mandates. I am not opposed in principle to elections in Northern Ireland or anywhere else—no democratic politician could oppose elections—but in this instance the Government are putting the cart before the horse by saying that elections should be the passport to all-party negotiations. Elections should be the outcome of all-party negotiations and should be based on a new constitutional framework that has been agreed at all-party negotiations.

The idea for elections did not come from the Mitchell commission. It was an Ulster Unionist idea, and it is therefore understandable that the nationalist community in Northern Ireland fears a resurrection of Stormont and a return to majority rule. The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) insisted that he never wanted the forum to have legislative or executive powers. He said that he wanted it to be simply a forum for all the people of Ulster. I am not sure about that, because I see no provision in the Bill for the inclusion of representatives from the people of Cavan, Monaghan or Donegal.

Clause 3(3) states:

"the forum shall not have any legislative, executive or administrative functions, or any power to determine the conduct, course or outcome of the negotiations mentioned in section 1."

That is fair enough, but perhaps the Minister can explain subsection (4):

"But if, in accordance with any rules of procedure adopted by them, the participants in the negotiations refer any matter to the forum, subsection (3) shall not be taken to prevent the forum from considering that matter."

I hope that, when the Minister replies or in Committee, we shall get a satisfactory explanation of that point. If the forum and the negotiating body are to be separate, we are entitled to a clear commitment that there will be no statutory link between the forum and the negotiations.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Ancram): Paragraph 7 of the ground rules papers permits that any reference or interaction with the forum

[Mr. Michael Ancram]

"to be convened following the elective process held to determine which parties will participate in the negotiations may take place solely by agreement among the negotiating teams to this effect and only at their formal instigation".

At the agreement of the negotiators, a reference can be made to the forum. It would be very wrong if there was a provision in the Bill that prevented the forum from considering that which had been referred to it by agreement following the negotiations under the ground rules.

Mr. Canavan: I understand the Minister's point, but there is a fear that in-built Unionist majorities in the negotiating body and in the forum could be almost tantamount to a Unionist veto if the negotiating body decided under the ground rules to refer something to the forum. We may return to that matter in Committee, but I am not satisfied at this stage with the Minister's response.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that he has not heard at any time from any pro-Union Member of Parliament in the run-up to this debate any suggestion that there should be a return to a Stormont form of majoritarianism, or any suggestion at any time that any such elected body should have any administrative or legislative powers? If that is the case, is there any foundation for any fear that there will be a return to a Stormont form of administration?

Mr. Canavan: The hon. and learned Gentleman should read in detail the Hansard report of the speech made by the hon. Member for North Antrim, whose position seemed to be that, as there is a Unionist majority, that majority should prevail. That is not my perception of democracy. It is a case not simply of the majority prevailing, but of the majority respecting the rights of minorities within the community. That is the only basis on which any democratic settlement can be reached in Northern Ireland.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I would like to make it clear to the hon. Gentleman that the negotiating bodies will not have a Unionist majority, because all parties will go into the negotiations with the same number of people. Unionists will be overwhelmingly in the minority at the negotiating table. That must be said clearly. We are entering into negotiations where the Unionists are in a permanent minority, and they should not be in that position.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman agrees that, if the Labour party has a majority in this House, it should govern the country. Surely the majority in a democracy must have a special place, although that does not mean that the minority do not have rights.

Mr. Canavan: The hon. Gentleman may be anticipating the results of the elections, which brings me to my next point—the method of the elections. The hon. Gentleman and I might reach at least a partial agreement on this matter.

The Government claim that they consulted all parties, and concluded that they could not please everybody. They have now produced this hotch-potch scheme, and have ended up apparently pleasing nobody. This is probably the first time in UK history that such an electoral system has been tried—it is probably the first time in world history.

The Government are laying themselves open to accusations that they have shifted the goalposts, and not just with regard to the system of elections. For example, they are deciding what is a party, and putting down in statute what constitutes a party. I take the view that any party—however large or small—should be able to contest the elections, but the Government are saying what a party is in the schedule. In addition, the Government are giving the Secretary of State the power to decide who is the leader of that party. I can imagine the derision that would result if the Prime Minister were to be given powers to decide who the Leader of the Opposition was to be.

Mr. Ancram: He might choose the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Canavan: Yes, it might be me.

Mr. Corbyn: Is my hon. Friend aware that, in all previous United Kingdom elections, the candidates have been people who happen to be members of parties, whereas it is now the parties that are contesting the elections—a fundamental change? Is he also aware that the Secretary of State is giving himself powers to exclude equally legitimate political organisations from contesting the elections? What we have here is the introduction into United Kingdom law of a kind of political censorship that has never existed before.

Mr. Canavan: My hon. Friend is perfectly correct. The Bill is in danger of bringing the United Kingdom's electoral system into disrepute.

About the only positive thing that I can see emerging from the Bill and the White Paper is the firm commitment—I hope it is a firm commitment—to start all-party negotiations on 10 June.

I would also like to refer to paragraph 24 of the White Paper, and the Minister may be able to respond to this point. It says:

"The negotiations will operate on the basis of consensus . . . (The rules for establishing sufficient consensus will be agreed in advance of negotiations by the participants and such rules will ensure that any departure from the rule of unanimity is within minimal limits and will, in all cases, ensure that any decision taken will be supported by a clear majority in both the unionist and nationalist communities in Northern Ireland.)"

How on earth will it be determined whether a decision is supported by "a clear majority" of the communities? We are entitled to some explanation of that point.

I hope that, despite the Bill, all the relevant parties will get together on 10 June. When I say relevant parties, I mean those parties which accept the six principles of the Mitchell report. Like other hon. Members, I hope that Sinn Fein is able to deliver an absolutely unequivocal ceasefire on the part of the IRA, because it would be a tragedy if the people who vote for Sinn Fein in the elections find themselves disfranchised and not represented at the negotiating table.

Once all the parties get round the table on that basis, I hope that there will be a new constitutional settlement put by way of a referendum not just to the people of Northern Ireland but, in accordance with what has been agreed by both Governments, to an all-Ireland test on both sides of the border. It would be helpful if both referendums were held on the same day.

I hope that what emerges is a new deal for the people of Northern Ireland, and that they can live in peace and harmony while respecting each other's differences in terms of culture and religious beliefs and building meaningful and constructive relationships across the communities and across the border on an all-Ireland basis.

6.29 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Using elections to select negotiating teams has to be right. Permanent peace and justice for all in Northern Ireland will, I suspect, come only through democracy. If the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) will allow me, I will assert some views of the people of Northern Ireland. These views, I believe, have the wholehearted support of the overwhelming majority of those I meet in Northern Ireland, and, if I understand the messages coming from the political parties in Northern Ireland, they have the total support of all the major parties in the Province.

I am totally committed to an exclusively democratic approach to solving the difficulties in Northern Ireland, and it is because of that that I am an enthusiastic supporter of all efforts to press ahead with a real peace process. We must do all we possibly can to hold all-party talks as quickly as possible, for exactly the reasons given earlier by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). It is also for those reasons that I am happy to back this attempt to hold elections. It follows that I am happy to vote for the Bill's Second Reading.

I must offer an apology to the Ulster Unionists on the Opposition Benches because I do not feel able to support their amendment. I believe that we need elections as quickly as possible, and that the best approach is to try to change the detail during the debates next week. There is one other reason why I consider it useful to explain why I will not support them. It does me no harm at all once in a while to take the opportunity of proving that I am my own man, and that I am not an unofficial member of either of the Unionist parties. So I will not be supporting the amendment.

Having said that, I caution the House against believing that the Bill, the elections or the proposed talks will guarantee the permanent peace we want, or justice for all. My reading of the past 18 months suggests that the Bill, the elections and the proposed talks will not achieve what we all want. My reservations about the entire process have been far too well recorded over recent months for me to need to repeat them now. Suffice it to say that my reservations remain, and were well and truly reinforced last night by yet another atrocity in London.

I note, rather surprisingly, that in Northern Ireland and the Republic there are some who are against elections in general and this scheme in particular. The people I have in mind are Sinn Fein-IRA, whose representatives regularly explain that they are against elections. I also have in mind a significant number of Irish Members of Parliament whom I meet in Dublin, who also explain that they are against these elections.

I find it extraordinary when I hear in Dublin that there is a body of opinion in the Republic which considers that "elections are not appropriate in Northern Ireland". All I can say is that such sentiments are deeply damaging and dangerous, and the people concerned should be ashamed of themselves for saying such things.

We are all familiar with Sinn Fein-IRA's regular denunciation of these elections. I can only assume that they are so opposed because they wish to prevent the world from being reminded of how few people vote for Sinn Fein in a secret ballot. They may also be anxious that the world should not be reminded that their power comes from the bullet and the bomb and not from the ballot box.

All I can ask of those who are against elections is: "What are you afraid of? Could it be that you are afraid of democracy? Could it be that you are afraid of the people of Northern Ireland?" I have always believed that the best and really the only test of a true commitment to democracy is one's ability and willingness to accept from the people a verdict with which one does not agree. That is the exact opposite of the message we are receiving from those who oppose the elections.

Although I wholeheartedly welcome the elections and the principles that underpin the Bill, I suspect that it will come as no surprise to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State that I am yet another person with reservations about the detail. I hasten to reassure my hon. Friends from the Whips Office that none of my reservations will bring me remotely close to wanting to oppose the Bill. However, some of my reservations will lead to amendments, and I will probably want to divide the House on Monday or Tuesday next week.

I have two major reservations: the electoral system that is proposed in the Bill and the use of a Command Paper to avoid putting the detail of the negotiations and the process into the Bill. I had hoped that the parties in Northern Ireland would have agreed on the way forward for the electoral system. That would have meant that I would simply have had to support them. I suppose, on reflection, that that was rather too much to hope. Therefore, I have to decide for myself on the best way forward.

I am nervous about extending the precedent of using proportional representation in United Kingdom elections, although I probably concede that we have to on this occasion. I am not persuaded that using individual constituencies is the best approach. I am opposed to any scheme that adds in the unelectable as an afterthought just to make up the numbers.

I sense that all those reservations could have been overcome if we had used a single constituency, because, above all else, that would avoid having to give seats to losers—people who could not get themselves elected by the people of Northern Ireland.

Using a Command Paper to spell out the detail is very worrying. It means that the detail in the paper is not really debatable, and it is certainly not amendable. If anything is undemocratic, I believe that it is that process. That is why I have it in mind to table amendments that will bring into the Bill the detail that is in the Command Paper. We can then have a full debate on the detail, and seek to amend it if we wish to do so.

Happily for hon. Members present today, there is only time for me to mention my four main concerns about the Command Paper. However, I do not want my right hon. and learned Friend and others on the Front Bench to think that I do not have more than four. Monday and Tuesday next week will be the time for that.

Paragraph 4 contains a significant change from the draft, because it now refers to the framework documents. My visits to Northern Ireland leave me in no doubt that the framework documents are totally unacceptable to the majority of those I meet in Northern Ireland. They are seen to this day as a green agenda and a sell-out to Dublin, making a united Ireland unavoidable. The tragedy is that most people on the mainland have long since lost sight of them and believe that they have gone away. To bring them back in this fashion risks ruining any prospect of talks before they even start.

Therefore, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State will confirm that a clean sheet of paper will start the agenda for the talks, that the only things that will get on to the agenda will be there with the consent of the parties, and that the framework documents will not be pushed on to the agenda because it is what the two Governments want.

Paragraph 9 of the Command Paper refers to the restoration of the Sinn Fein-IRA ceasefire. For the avoidance of doubt, let me repeat what I said in my interventions—that reinstating the previous temporary truce is simply not enough. I asked my right hon. and learned Friend and the Opposition spokesman whether any new ceasefire would have to be permanent. I am willing to give way to them if I misunderstood what I heard, but I noted that neither was prepared to insist that all participants renounce for ever the use of violence if they do not get their own way.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I hope that my hon. Friend will not overlook the fact that I have made it clear that, at the very beginning of the negotiations, once a ceasefire has been restored in the terms of August 1994, it will be necessary for Sinn Fein and all other parties to give an absolute commitment to each and every one of the Mitchell commission's principles on democracy and non-violence. Those principles were dwelt on at great length and to great effect by the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble). I therefore hope that my hon. Friend will not overlook the true effect of that.

Mr. Wilshire: I note what my right hon. and learned Friend says. I think that the record will show that my interpretation was correct. What I have just heard again suggests that the Government will consider allowing into the start of the talks a party that has restored only a temporary truce; only then will there be discussions as to permanence. That confirms my point. The participants will not first be required to renounce violence for ever.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that neither the Secretary of State nor the Opposition spokesman will use the dreaded word "permanent", because they are both well aware that if they use the word there will be no prospect of getting Sinn Fein into the democratic loop of discussions? It may not be wanted, but it will certainly never come in if it is required to give an assurance that it will never return to violence, because violence—in the absence of a real mandate—is the only card it holds.

Mr. Wilshire: I wholeheartedly agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman. Unfortunately, far too few people understand that fundamental point. That is why I chose to remind the House of the importance of permanence.

I have never had any doubt—if anyone else has, he should look at the evidence—that Sinn Fein-IRA have, to this day, only one objective. They will use discussion if they believe that that will help them, but if they think that it will not help them, they remain committed to bombing and shooting into submission anyone foolish enough or weak enough to believe that it is possible to humour evil terrorists. That is the message on which the hon. and learned Gentleman and I wholeheartedly agree.

Paragraph 17 refers to the six Mitchell principles, but it stops short of insisting that all participants sign up to all six principles, without exception. It also stops short of insisting that they sign up to them before anything else happens. I am not reassured by the word "addressing". It would be perfectly possible to arrive at the negotiating table every day of the discussions, to say "good morning" to the document containing the principles, and then to carry on. It simply will not do.

I know that some will say that I am attempting to introduce preconditions, but that is a sterile debating point. The fact is that, without a permanent ceasefire and without complete acceptance of the Mitchell principles, there will not be all-party talks. Some will say that I am demanding that Sinn Fein-IRA, or the Protestant paramilitaries for that matter, make a concession. I am not ashamed of that; for the past 18 months, the Government and this House have given concession after concession to the men of violence, and they have yet to concede a single thing. So I am not worried by the accusation that I may be asking for a concession: it is about time there was one.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I think the hon. Gentleman will agree that the joint communiqué from both Prime Ministers spelled out clearly that there must be more than just an "addressing" of the Mitchell report. It said that the parties were to sign up to the Mitchell report, and deal with decommissioning as well. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is a tendency to weaken those requirements in the new structures set forth by the Government.

Mr. Wilshire: That has certainly been my understanding of what has been said time and again, which is why I am deeply suspicious of what I read in the Command Paper. I see no such requirements set out there. I have long since learnt that such omissions are not due to sloppy draftsmanship. I must therefore ask myself why the requirement has been omitted. Hence the need to amend the Bill.

My fourth basic worry arises from paragraph 10, which refers to the validation of any all-party talks by means of a referendum. In rather strange language, this paragraph mentions not in Northern Ireland and the Republic. Until that is changed, I shall remain deeply suspicious of what is intended. I have been involved long enough to know that every word and phrase in every Northern Ireland document is there for a purpose. I should be most interested to hear my right hon. and learned Friend explain this phrase.

"referendums in Ireland—North and South",

Another worry about paragraph 10 is that it does not commit either Government to accepting the verdict of the people. The Bill and the document merely make provision to ask the people for their views. Nowhere that I can see do they confirm that the assent of the majority of the people of Northern Ireland will be binding. That must be put right on Monday and Tuesday of next week.

I have, as I said, a number of other reservations too, but they are best left to our detailed discussion on Monday. Both the Bill and the Command Paper need serious clarification next week if they are to be acceptable to us. Much of the detail in the Command Paper must find its way into the Bill itself. I therefore urge the Government to look hard at ways of doing that over the coming weekend.

I also believe that the electoral process proposed is far from ideal, but I am resigned to the fact that we are too far down the road to reverse now. Despite all these reservations, I still believe that democracy offers the only real hope for the future of Northern Ireland. The elections are the essence of the democracy that we want for Northern Ireland, and in that spirit I will be voting for the Bill tonight. I look forward to helping to improve it next week.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): I apologise to the House and to the Secretary of State for the absence of my colleagues and myself during the opening moments of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's address, but our deputy leader was taken ill. He apologises for not being in the Chamber this afternoon. In that regard, I understand that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) made a critical comment about our absence, but I am sure that she would not have done so if she had been aware of the circumstances.

I speak about the Bill as the representative of the party to which the majority of nationalists living in Northern Ireland give their support and as the representative of a community whose consent to the structures in place over them historically was never asked, earned or given. My colleagues and I have spent a political lifetime combating the violence that flowed from that political failure, due in large measure to the mistakes made over the years around the British Cabinet table and in the House. Our electors have learnt from their particular bitter experience to approach the prospect of legislation by Westminster not with hope but with trepidation.

For more than a year and a half since August 1994 we had an opportunity to approach the negotiation table free from the immediate shadow of violence. The Prime Minister will remember from his reception in the town of Downpatrick in my constituency how much he was then seen as the bearer of hope. Sadly, that hope has dissipated and confidence has gone. I cannot pretend to disentangle the motives that produced so much energy to put the brake on the political momentum that could and should have come from the peace era, but there was a manifest need to build on that momentum and underpin the ceasefires through immediate unconditional negotiations and agreement. I can understand that a Unionist leadership might want to exploit the tactical advantage, but it is their nationalist neighbours, not them, whose aspirations have been denied expression. I understand that the Unionists might be tempted to follow their inherited instinct that the consent of their nationalist neighbours does not matter much. They have successfully shifted the focus of what might feature in the negotiations to whether there should be negotiations at all.

Two parties out of the total number have refused to negotiate, and those two parties are represented in the Chamber this evening. There will be an election involving 33 parties because the British Government were drawn or, for all I know, entered willingly into a Unionist-led agenda. The nationalist community took the message about the Government's priorities and, tragically, the devaluation of the ceasefire became a self-fulfilling prophecy.

In striking that note, I do not want to detract from the great importance of the setting of 10 June as a fixed date for all-party talks. I want only to stress how costly has been the delay, and that the wariness and misgivings felt in my community are justified by experience, including our recent experiences. I want to stress also that the preliminaries put between us and that date in the form of the Bill make the task of negotiations more difficult and uncertain than it need have been.

The predictability of Northern Ireland's election results is proverbial. All the serious parties already have mandates. We have had 21 elections in the past 20 years, and we know that elections are deeply polarising in our community and always have been. They are about victory and defeat. An election is fought, but negotiations are about common interests and striving for compromise. However, those two contradictory things have been grouped together in the proposals, only because the Unionists wanted the ritual comfort of confirmation that there is a Unionist majority and a nationalist minority in Northern Ireland, and because the British Government failed to assert leadership in the wider common interest.

As a result, the electors are faced with an election that will distil and combine the worst features of the list and proportional representation cum constituency system. The electorate will have to choose from an array of more than 33 options in a list that reads as though it was concocted on 1 April. The Government's plans also ensure that about 70 people will be involved in each negotiating session. The mind boggles at that concept. Nevertheless, the Social Democratic and Labour party is well used to fighting and winning elections in the most difficult circumstances, and the ballot box has not and will not hold any fears for us. If the negotiations are to be truly meaningful, that unnecessary and exasperating detour may be a price worth paying—provided the negotiations seek a real and permanent solution.

More disturbing, and the part of the Bill about which I have the greatest reservations, are the provisions relating to the proposed forum. We have from the beginning made clear our strenuous opposition to the creation of an elected body within the negotiating process. Our fundamental concern is that no matter how innocuous a proposal might appear on paper, and no matter how circumscribed by legislation, we know historically that reality can be quite different. The history of such initiatives in Northern Ireland gives ample justification for our fears. Each time a consultative assembly has been set up in Northern Ireland, it has inevitably been used as a vehicle for Unionists to assert their dominance. Irrespective of the intention of British Ministers, Dr. Jekyll has the habit of becoming Mr. Hyde. Our anxiety is that a body with an in-built Unionist majority might seek to influence and control the negotiations, even if it is formally prevented from doing so. It could in those circumstances, and given certain events, poison the atmosphere through the adoption of declarations and resolutions, making progress in the real negotiations much more difficult. The negotiating process will be difficult enough without the forum acting as a rival political focus or a counterpoint to negotiation in the search for accommodation.

Any hon. Members who think that I am exaggerating should consider previous speakers' comments on the forum. I am glad that the deputy leader of the Democratic Unionist party, the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), is in his place because I want to quote his comments broadcast by RTE yesterday. He said:

"we went over this on several occasions with Michael Ancram during the course of today. That does not stop the forum putting forward proposals which could be the same as those proposals being considered by the negotiators, and making a view known of those issues. And I'm saying that, from our party's point of view, we would not enter into any agreement, not finalise any agreement in the negotiations, which had not been endorsed by the forum"— thereby giving the forum a life and existence that the Bill alleges it will not have.

That attitude has been expressed despite the fact that we anticipate that the outcome of the negotiations will be validated by the referendum. It seems to us that the intent of the two Unionist parties—it has been expressed not only in tonight's debate—is for the forum and not the negotiating table to be the ultimate endorsement of what happens in negotiations.

The Northern Ireland Office paper of 21 March sought to allay such fears, and we understand that was its purpose. The paper said that the forum's purpose would be to promote dialogue and mutual understanding and, most important, that it would be required to proceed on a basis of broad consensus.

The requirement for broad consensus was potentially of great significance. It offered some measure of protection against majoritarian exploitation of the forum. That protection has now entirely disappeared. Schedule 2 to the Bill simply states:

"The rules of procedure of the forum shall include provision for a quorum."

It contains no requirement whatever that the forum must operate on the basis of broad consensus. We believe that there is an urgent need to include a requirement for broad consensus, as specified in paragraph 24 of Cmnd. 3232.

Schedule 2 to the Bill also proposes:

"A decision on the election or removal of a chairman or the adoption or alteration of rules of procedure shall not be regarded as taken by the members unless—

(a) no member present has objected to it, or

(b) it is approved on a vote by at least 75 per cent. of those voting."

It requires a vote by not 75 per cent. of the membership but by 75 per cent. of those voting.

We were assured that the forum would not be a body with legislative, administrative or executive functions but that it would be a consultative and deliberative body charged with promoting dialogue and mutual understanding. Taking decisions on a majoritarian basis, even on a weighted basis, is surely entirely at variance with the spirit of dialogue and mutual understanding. In its procedures, the forum should practise what it is expected to preach.

What decisions will the forum take on which it should not have to operate on the basis of consensus? What dialogue and mutual understanding will be found by voting down even a quarter of the people engaged in that search for dialogue and understanding? If the negotiations—which will deal with much more difficult and decisive subjects—are to proceed on the basis of consensus, it is hard to understand why the forum should not operate on the same basis.

I almost hesitate to refer to the Dublin forum, which was a non-elected body. In that forum, as many as 13 very diverse delegations managed, with a little common sense and a bit of give and take, to conduct the business of a body that is very similar to the one that has been proposed. The Government recognise that, in certain contexts, consensus is efficient and a necessary element for progress. To prove the point, the White Paper on the European Union states that the Government

"does not accept that the unanimity provisions for CFSP are a constraint on its development."

So let it not be a constraint on the forum's development.

The fundamental error that the Government are making is to apply the logic of a decision-making body or assembly to a body or assembly that is of a quite different character, which will of course heighten concerns that their protestations about the body's nature and functions are not entirely sincere. The importation of majoritarian procedures into a body that is being operated in parallel with the negotiations creates a serious risk that the whole process could be infected or affected by those procedures.

In the interests of the negotiations and of the great goal of peace and agreement, which is the ultimate prize, members of the SDLP seek—despite the extent of our reservations about the elective process—to take a fair and positive view of the overall package that has been presented to us. Should the Bill be enacted unamended, it will be much harder for us to persuade a very suspicious nationalist community that a serious and meaningful process is on offer.

In their communiqué of 20 February, the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach agreed that "an elective process would have to be broadly acceptable and lead immediately and without further preconditions to the convening of all-party talks".

No sooner had the proposal of an election been nailed on the agenda—in a form that cynically devalued any concept of broad acceptability of nationalist views—than we had forced on us the further stage of a proposed forum, which is unwelcome to everyone in the nationalist community and discards the commitment to "consensus" and "broad consensus" that had been flagged in two formal Government papers.

Even if this forum were not a precondition for negotiations—I should expect the Prime Minister, under the terms of the February communiqué, to confirm that it is not—the loss of the element of consensus will damage, perhaps fatally, the capacity of any nationalist leader in Northern Ireland to persuade the nationalist community to view negotiations in a positive light, or other than as a threat or advance instalment of a process aimed at directing the negotiations to a totally and exclusively internal solution. We shall table amendments at the appropriate stage on those key points, but I should like to tell the House now that its decision on this issue will have a very significant symbolic and practical impact on nationalist attitudes to the proposed forum.

On behalf of my party, I welcome the publication of the Bill because it marks a staging post on the route to 10 June. I do not welcome the Bill itself. The process it defines is unnecessary, divisive and deeply flawed. I am confident that the Bill has the potential to cause major difficulties in the future that could prejudice and jeopardise the negotiations' progress. It remains to be seen whether the Government have led us into a long and unnecessary detour or into a quagmire. Nevertheless, despite their strange decision to proceed to negotiations by this twisted and possibly potholed route, we acknowledge that the journey has begun with the Bill's introduction.

A document that is perhaps of greater relevance to the real needs of the situation was published on Tuesday as "Ground Rules for Substantive All-Party Negotiations". It essentially defines the negotiations' scope, purpose and processes. It is vital that the two Governments, acting together, have a common view of the parameters of the negotiations. My party welcomes the fact that, following a period of consultation, the Governments have reached a definitive common judgment on the most suitable and broadly accepted ground rules.

It is reassuring that the ground rules paper is, in most respects, broadly unchanged from the consultation document that was circulated to the parties on 15 March last year. The purpose of negotiations will be to achieve a new beginning for negotiations in Northern Ireland, in the island of Ireland and between the peoples of these islands. The purpose will also be to agree new institutions and structures to take account of the totality of that relationship. I hope that the three-stranded structure agreed in May 1991, which reflects the equal weight and independent standing of those three relationships, remains in place. Likewise, the vital principle that nothing will be agreed in any strand until everything is agreed in the negotiations as a whole has been preserved. The central role played together by the two Governments in the overall management of the negotiation is also essential.

It is important, however, that paragraph 7 of the paper makes it explicit that the conduct of the negotiations will be exclusively a matter for those involved in them. Any reference to or interaction with the forum may take place solely with the agreement of the negotiating teams to this effect, and only at their formal instigation—and, we hope, on the basis of consensus, as stipulated in paragraph 24 of Cmnd. 3232. It is essential that this necessary separation is preserved and, if possible, strengthened. There can be no breach of the integrity of the ground rules as a package by seeking to process the negotiations through an internalist and majoritarian filter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Of course there can."]

It is also encouraging that the two Governments have included in the ground rules paper an explicit reference to the framework document. This serves to refocus us on the core issues to be resolved in the negotiations. For too long, quibbles over mechanics and technicalities have got in the way of discussions on the real issues. The framework document sets out the broad outline of a possible settlement that nationalists and Unionists could accept as their own.

The four guiding principles in the framework document must underpin any agreement and inform the search for that agreement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Another precondition."] Perhaps hon. Members will agree with them when they hear them. They are as follows: the principle of self-determination set out in the joint document; that the consent of the governed is an essential ingredient for stability in any political arrangement—as we have said often, acceptance by most nationalists of the principle of consent to any change in the status of Northern Ireland does not equate with the acceptance of the status of Northern Ireland itself—[HON. MEMBERS: "A good let-out."]; the necessity that agreement be pursued and established by exclusively democratic, peaceful means without resort to violence or coercion of any nature; and that the new political arrangements must be based on full respect for and protection of the expression of the rights and identities of both traditions in Ireland and evenhandedly afford both communities in Northern Ireland parity of esteem and treatment, including equality of opportunity and advantage. [Interruption.] I understand that those four principles are generally accepted by both Unionists and nationalists as a fair way forward, so I cannot understand the sedentary comments of disagreement from behind me.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that people such as me endorse parity of esteem on an individual basis—that is, equality before the law, equality of opportunity and the affording of any civil right on an equal basis to every individual, no matter what his religion or political outlook? That form of parity of esteem is acknowledged in every democratic country, in some by means of a written constitution, but I know of no democratic process whereby the political rights of a minority to determine the political identity of a state—the parity of esteem that the hon. Gentleman claims—is an accepted principle.

Mr. McGrady: I thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for asking that question. The sum of the individual attitudes is the sum of the attitudes of the community as a whole. He referred to parity of esteem as in some way negating the rights of the majority. That is contrary to what I have just been saying. If he wants me to repeat it, I shall say that we endorse the evolution of whatever political outcome we reach by acceptance on the basis of consensus and majority. What is the problem? Back in 1970, long before it became fashionable in the House or in the hon. and learned Gentleman's party or indeed, my previous party, article 4 of my party's constitution accepted that the status of Northern Ireland could not be changed without the consent of the majority in Northern Ireland. That is part of my party's constitution.

We believe that no agreement can be achieved or can endure if it does not honour and reflect the vital principles that I have emphasised. A number of important points relating to the negotiations remain to be resolved or filled out. We shall endeavour to ensure that nothing is done that will weaken the negotiating structure set out in the ground rules. We accept that the multiplicity of participants who are likely to be involved may make it necessary on rare occasions—I am cautious on this one—to move away from the rule of total unanimity and towards sufficient consensus. That will be a very difficult area to define. However, it is important that, as signalled in the ground rules paper, the rules for establishing sufficient consensus are clearly agreed in advance and that any decision must have clear majority support in both communities—not cross-party support, but cross-community support within the republican tradition and the Unionist tradition.

The chairmanship of the north-south strand has to be determined. It will be a crucial appointment to confidence in the negotiating process. The SDLP looks forward to the appointment of an experienced, authoritative chairperson of proven integrity and independence of judgment.

We feel that what precisely will happen at the opening of the negotiations needs to be fleshed out further, in particular with regard to decommissioning, which has been mentioned many times tonight. The SDLP strongly and unequivocally supports the subscription of all participants to the habitual principles of democracy and non-violence.

The international body's proposal on decommissioning must also be given high priority, as it was envisaged in the communiqué of 28 February and in the ground rules paper. We reiterate once more that the people who most want to see total decommissioning of all paramilitary weapons are the Irish people as a whole. At the same time, if decommissioning is reimported into the negotiations to serve as a road block or obstacle to the discussions on the full agenda of political questions, there will be two certain consequences. First, there will not be serious negotiations and, secondly, there will not be any decommissioning.

Parties that may be tempted to strike postures on the issue of decommissioning should think carefully about what they are doing and what they could condemn the people of Northern Ireland to. The reality is that political progress and progress on decommissioning will proceed in tandem. To seek total satisfaction on decommissioning at the beginning of the negotiations before moving to any other issue would be at variance with the further confidence-building requirement identified by the Prime Minister and the Taoiseach when they say:

"Confidence building would also require that the parties have reassurance that a meaningful and inclusive process of negotiations is genuinely being offered to address the legitimate concerns of both traditions, and the need for new political arrangements with which all can identify."

No party can have a veto on the agenda and, as stated in the ground rules paper, all topics must be fully addressed. It is vital, therefore, that the Government live up to their commitments in the ground rules paper with regard to their determination that the structure and process of the negotiations will be used in the most constructive manner possible in the search for that agreement. They will need to match their words with vigorous action in their management of what will inevitably be a tortuous process.

The SDLP's focus is, accordingly, on the negotiations themselves. That is the big picture and the context in which we judge the Bill. It is essential that we move immediately and directly from the elections into negotiations and that those negotiations proceed without direction from or interference or second-guessing by those not involved in the negotiation process or who may wish to deflect the negotiations from their proper purpose.

We disagree with many parts of the Bill. We will table a series of amendments that will show that disagreement. I would like to think that, in the context of what I have said tonight, the Government will consider those amendments, see their validity and accept them as amendments to the Bill in its totality.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East): This would be a great opportunity to follow the points made by the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), but given the limited time that I have available I would have no time to make any comments of my own. At the outset, I wish to express—on behalf of my colleagues and, I am sure, everyone in the House—genuine wishes for a full and speedy return to health by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon).

I must tell the hon. Member for South Down that there has never been any unwillingness to enter into negotiations on the part of either of the two Unionist parties that he mentioned. There has been an unwillingness—rightly—to enter into negotiations with those who are terrorists and an unwillingness to find ourselves in a process for which others had set the agenda, which was tilted to allow only one conceivable outcome. It is proper for any responsible political party to ensure that when it enters negotiations, it does so on the basis of a suitable agenda and with those that it is possible to respect as constitutional and legitimate political parties.

The birth of this process comes from the failure of the Government to initiate the process that they had desired through the Anglo-Irish Agreement, on through the Downing street declaration and into the framework document. The Government recognised that they could not, through that process, get the consent of the people of Northern Ireland. After many failures, the Democratic Unionist party directed the attention of the Government to the necessity of imbibing the principle of consent as the core to any successful outcome to any negotiations. Unless that principle of consent is accepted by those who take part in negotiations—principally by the Government—there can never be a successful outcome.

On that basis and foundation, my party put forward a proposal in 1993 for a constitutional convention. I happily claim ownership of that concept. There is nothing to be ashamed of in putting forward a proposal for an elected constitutional convention. Why would any hon. Member of this democratic House think that there was something untoward about such a proposition? Undoubtedly, those who are nationalists do not like anything that reminds them of the awkward fact that there are a lot of Unionists in Northern Ireland, but that is the reality. If it is recognised that government cannot take place without consent, it is necessary to gain the consent of those who are the majority as well as those who are the minority.

We argued to the Government that, through an elected process, negotiations could take place that could test the validity and weight of arguments and whether there was any consensus for any proposals that the negotiators might produce. Some years later, however, the Government have come forward with an emasculated form of convention with a rigged election, a bridled forum and a stacked negotiating process with predetermined ground rules.

I will discuss the election system first. The Government set the criteria. The Prime Minister said in the House that if there was a broadly acceptable electoral process, it would be endorsed by the Government. We set out to meet the criteria that the Prime Minister laid down. In my view, we met those criteria when a Province-wide list system was agreed as the method for going forward.

The Government recognised that there were two main propositions—I emphasise the word two—and they put forward a further consultative paper pointing out that there were two main options: a list system or a single transferable vote system. The parties were asked to choose between those two systems. Overwhelmingly, the parties—those who represented 70 per cent. of the electorate in Northern Ireland at the election—supported the list system. For whatever reason, however—and I do not seek to draw attention to any problems that the Government may have with some of their Back Benchers or the fact that they wanted to bring along parties such as the Ulster Unionist party and the Alliance party—the Government decided to abandon that broad acceptability and turn their back on it. To justify that, the Prime Minister came to the House and said that three systems were being considered, not two. He sought to divide the Social Democratic and Labour party's position from that of my party, but the agreement that we had was for a list system. The other minutiae could have been decided by the Government, but instead of a system that was broadly acceptable they came forward with one that was totally unacceptable to all the parties.

The Government managed to bring together all the worst aspects of each election system and none of the good aspects. It has been said that the process would be the first time perhaps anywhere in the world that such a system was used, and I trust that it will also be the last. To the constituency list has been added a regional list in which no differentiation will be made between those who have substantial support and those who have next to no support at all. That shows that the Government have decided what they would like the results of the election to be and have determined a system that will produce the result that they want.

I understand—more, I agree with—the concerns of the Ulster Unionist party. It has looked at the list and seen the possibility for widespread confusion. Someone could come to the ballot booth, look at one of the names and be justified in believing that he was voting for the Ulster Unionist party as represented in the House when in fact he would be doing nothing of the sort. Anyone who came into the ballot booth might look at the name of the Ulster Democratic party and think that he was voting for the Democratic Unionist party. He might read the name of the Independent Democratic Unionist party and think that he was voting for the Democratic Unionist party. There would be a lot of scope to confuse the electorate.

If there is a long list on the ballot paper—it will be a yard long by the time the process finishes—with names of political parties and independents on it, it is essential that there should be as clear a definition as possible of the parties for which people wish to vote. The Government have no alternative but to allow the political parties to put their names on the ballot paper in the way that they believe will ensure that there is no confusion. The Government must also set in place a system in which an appeal can be made if a political party feels that some other group has come forward with a name that is merely an attempt to steal its clothes and its votes. The Minister must recognise that there is cause to believe that some political parties are named on that list for that very purpose. The Province-wide list should be abolished. If it is not abolished, it should be democratised as far as possible by scaling the number of representatives from it on the basis of the strength of the parties' votes in the constituency lists.

The other element of the process that leaves me less than content is the way in which the Government have dealt with the forum. The hon. Member for South Down referred to comments that I made on Radio Telefis Eireann about the forum. No Bill can be so worded as to guard against the ingenuity of some people and to ensure that democratic principles will ultimately be adhered to.

I make no apology for saying that this elected forum of the people of Northern Ireland should not have a role in determining whether there is sufficient consensus for proposals made by a fixed group of negotiators with no democratic content. They are not there on the basis of the strength of their vote but in the same numbers, whether their vote is large or small. There is clearly a need to ensure that there is a test of the views that the negotiators have expressed and agreed. No one should run away from the fact that the forum should be the litmus test of what the negotiators deem should be the proposals for constitutional change.

Mr. McAvoy: I want to ask a variation of the question that I asked the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) earlier. What confidence does the hon. Gentleman have that that assembly—or forum or Stormont; it is only a name and not a system that I am talking about—would get the confidence of the nationalist community for a consensus on the future of Northern Ireland when every such body has failed in the past?

Mr. Robinson: There has been no body of this sort in the past. The hon. Gentleman is thinking of bodies that have nothing to do with the negotiating process that the House is setting up tonight. This process allows for a primarily deliberative forum, but it would be a testing ground for any proposals that others generate. It will be able to test whether they have sufficient consensus and are therefore likely to pass the ultimate test of a referendum of the people of Northern Ireland. Paragraph 23 of the document produced by the two Governments, quote, unquote, as the hon. Member for South Down mentioned, states:

"The negotiations will proceed on the principle that nothing will be finally agreed in any strand until everything is agreed in the negotiations as a whole."

On Radio Telefis Eireann, I simply said that we would not be satisfied with a final agreement unless we were happy that it would stick in the community. The only way that that can be tested is by finding whether it obtains a sufficient consensus among the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland.

To bring in the question asked by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Rutherglen (Mr. McAvoy), we proposed a weighted majority to determine whether there was sufficient consensus. There was not to have been a 50 per cent. plus vote but a requirement that there should be a weighted majority that could not be reached unless there was support from nationalist representatives.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in the past—for example, after the Sunningdale negotiations—the failure of negotiators to consult their constituencies meant that ultimately the package that they had agreed was rejected by the community and that one of the benefits of having the forum consider and validate the proposals of the negotiators would be in avoiding that situation?

Mr. Robinson: Yes. History has perhaps done more to confirm the hon. and learned Gentleman's comments than anything that I might say. If that lesson has not been learnt by now, it never will be. We saw the terrible tragedy of those who believed that they could defy the wishes of the people. They came to agreements in smoke-filled rooms—perhaps their arms were twisted, perhaps promises were made—but they reached agreements for which they could not secure support in their communities.

The forum is a way in which we can test whether something will have sufficient consensus. I know that that is not excluded by the Bill, but I believe that it should be expressly included. There is no threat to the negotiators in that process. I should have thought that having a body which can determine at any stage, on any proposition, the degree of support that might be generated in the community as a whole would be a positive factor on which the negotiators would want to draw. I trust that we shall not end up having a forum and a negotiating process which are locked against each other. They should use each other to further the process and to try to reach agreement.

Mr. McGrady: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the provision in the Bill for a referendum on any agreement would give the ultimate democratic approval and ensure that the people, who are the ultimate arbitrators, have the final say?

Mr. Robinson: It will be the ultimate say, but I am sure that the Government will not be too happy at the prospect of having a multiplicity of referendums at the whim of negotiators who say, "Let's try this one on the people." To have a referendum, the negotiators must be fairly certain that the question that is to be put will get the support of the people. If they are not satisfied about that, or if they are not satisfactorily informed about what the views of the people are likely to be by the forum, the proposition will not be sound. The forum has an excellent role as a litmus test for proposals. If they are to succeed, many of the proposals will have to be novel. That will be essential. If we dredge up the failures of the past, we shall fail again.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Was not this lesson taught to the House after Sunningdale? The Government said that there would never be a referendum and then the Heath Government fell. Mr. Fitt is on record as saying that that was the tragedy. It went to the people and every Opposition Member was wiped out except Gerry Fitt. The united Unionist coalition carried the day. The people spoke and that was the end of the Sunningdale agreement. Everyone argued about whether the people were aware of what was going on. Mr. Faulkner was busy selling it around the country, but he was swept away and became a leader without Indians.

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend makes a point similar to that of the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney). They reinforce the fact that the forum has a meaningful role to play, but that is not its only role. It also has a useful role in terms of informing the negotiators of issues, giving them views after it has met and questioned members of the public, community groups, women's organisations, Churches, trade unions and others on the various subjects with which the negotiators will have to deal. That ensures a grass-roots involvement in the process. I trust that that at least is something in the process that the hon. Member for South Down would welcome.

I trust that the Bill's course will not be marked by the refusal of the Government or of hon. Members to recognise that there is a useful role for the forum and that it should be trusted with the minimal role of expressing its opinion and being able to test the weight of support for various propositions. I fear, however, that the wording—perhaps the number of previous Bills, orders, Command Papers, documents and communiqués that the Government have produced makes me suspicious—in talking about the role of the forum being only deliberative, suggests that it may not even be able to determine the issues that it is to discuss. Rather than saying what the forum is not allowed to do, the Government should give us some indication as to the things that the forum can actually do, so as to ensure that it has a meaningful role.

I have exactly the same fears as those that I believe were expressed by the hon. Member for South Down. When one looks at the list, it is conceivable that at least 76 people will be around the negotiating table. Each of the top 10 parties on the list, according to the Bill, will have three negotiators as well as three people behind them, but the two Governments will have five people behind them. That means that a stadium full of people will be present while a negotiating process is supposed to be going on. Does anyone really believe that with 76 people present there will be meaningful negotiations? Of course not.

We were in a much smaller body during the last talks process and it was not long before we discovered that we had to reduce that body still further. We had not operated that smaller body for a week before we realised that it was far better to get one or two people to go off and talk in the corridor and see what degree of agreement could be reached. Let us not suppose that the proposed body, when it meets collectively, will negotiate. The very most that it can do will be to register what agreements have been reached and to report on what has taken place in terms of the real negotiations—the bilateral, trilateral and other meetings that will take place in the rooms of the negotiating teams.

If the negotiations are to be based on the ground rules that the Government have published in Cmnd. 3232, I believe that they will be far from successful. The Government cannot get away with that one. They cannot come to the House and say that the guidelines are broadly acceptable. Broadly acceptable to whom? The Ulster Unionist party has said that it does not accept them and the Minister knows that my party does not accept them—we have told him that often enough. Some ground rules within the guidelines are totally acceptable, but others are not. It is clear that the first thing that the negotiators will have to do when they meet is to determine the basic ground rules that will govern their proceedings.

Even the ground rules as set out in Cmnd. 3232 leave a great deal of additional work to be carried out. For instance, the most fundamental questions in the ground rules are these. What is consensus, what is sufficient consensus, and what is agreement? And what is the measure of that agreement within the negotiating process? If one cannot agree on what agreement is, there could be major difficulties in the days ahead.

I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) that it is essential that some work is done, perhaps even between the political parties in Northern Ireland before we get to those negotiations, to see if we can reach a consensus on what agreement, consensus and sufficient consensus should mean. The difficulty for me is that painful experience suggests that when we have broad agreement among political parties in Northern Ireland, the Government turn their back on it. Therefore, the Minister reaps what he has sown by his refusal to accept broad agreement when it existed.

The ground rules are being imposed by two Governments, quote unquote, which means that two of the players in the negotiations have met together before the negotiations are to take place, decided what is best for themselves and imposed it on the others. They have ensured that they have ground rules which will lean towards the kind of outcome that they want. They even flagged their desired outcome by saying, "Look, we have signed up to a framework document, boys, and we are almost committed and bound by that: that is the way you should be going." If that is what the Minister thinks, he will be bitterly disillusioned in the meetings that take place after 10 June, because I must tell him and the hon. Member for South Down that Unionists do not see the framework document as the basis for an agreement for the future of Northern Ireland and its relationship with the Government of the Irish Republic.

Let me be clear about this. Unionists want to have a stable means of government for Northern Ireland and they want to have a co-operative and friendly relationship with the Government of the Irish Republic. They trust that the Government of the Irish Republic will face up to what Unionists see as the main obstacle to that: the territorial claim in the Irish Republic's constitution. I can abide by the commitment being sought in paragraph 16 of the ground rules, which asks that all negotiators "will take part in good faith"

"seriously address all aspects of the agreed agenda".

It is not in the interests of any Unionist not to take part in the process in good faith. We want to ensure that we have a process that is built upon a sound foundation, which is capable of producing a satisfactory result for all people of Northern Ireland, and one that can generate the necessary support from the people in our community at a referendum afterwards.

The Bill as currently drafted is deficient in many ways. Indeed, it is deficient in so many ways that it will be impossible to vote in support of it tonight. I trust that the Minister will be open enough in Committee on the Bill to recognise that serious concerns must be taken on board. He must recognise that changes can be made to the Bill and that it simply cannot be pushed through the House, even with the use of the guillotine, should the Government decide to use that procedure. That would ignore the wishes of the elected representatives from Northern Ireland.

Changes could be made to the Bill to make its proposals worth while so that the people of Northern Ireland can have faith in them. The onus will be on the Government, however, and we shall see from their behaviour on Monday, when we debate the Bill in Committee, whether they are prepared to make the changes that will make the Bill a worthwhile measure for the people of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Thomas McAvoy (Glasgow, Rutherglen): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), who has expressed a considered point of view that there is the prospect of genuine dialogue between the parties in Northern Ireland.

I should like to endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam). I should also like to thank and congratulate the Secretary of State and his team on the work they have put into the Bill. In the past, I have had my doubts about the veracity of the Tory party in a general election year, especially given its track record of making deals with the Ulster Unionists to sustain itself. I still support that view, although one cannot condemn without some evidence. I accept that my view, which is based on a suspicion—but founded on history—is, nevertheless, only a suspicion. By presenting the Bill and the ground rules, however, I accept totally the sincerity and genuineness of the Secretary of State and his team. It is clear that they were looking for suggestions and assistance and that they had an open mind about how to proceed in the aftermath of the events in February.

It would be easy to pick holes in the Bill and criticise the logic of certain parts of it. All sorts of phrases have been used to describe the contortions in it. Those very contortions and manoeuvres, which are meant to try to find something acceptable to all parties, reveal the genuineness of the Government's attempt to try to move the process forward. I have no doubt that Monday and Tuesday night will offer an opportunity to try to improve the Bill through amendments designed to tackle those bits about which many of us are not happy. It must be said, however, that the Bill represents a genuine attempt to move forward, and it should be supported.

Although every party, especially those from Northern Ireland, can pick faults with the Bill, surely the facts of life mean that if the Government came up with a set of proposals that were totally acceptable to one of the parties in Northern Ireland, by definition the other parties would not appear at the negotiating table. The Government, by not pleasing everyone, including the Opposition, have certainly shown that they are trying to get people around the negotiating table.

I strongly support, as does the Labour party, the six principles in the Mitchell report. I fully understand the reservations and trepidations of our Northern Ireland colleagues in relation to paramilitary participation and negotiations. I take the point of view, as does the Labour party, that any organisation that signs up to the six principles in the Mitchell commission report and then totally abandons them will lose all credibility and support from within the community that originally supported it.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that Sinn Fein-IRA have never had the slightest difficulty in dealing with any lack of credibility from the community generally in relation to their activities? Does he also accept that probably 90 to 95 per cent. of the population of Northern Ireland, from both communities, abhors Sinn Fein-IRA activities but that that does not seem to deter events as recent as that of last evening?

Mr. McAvoy: I totally condemn violence in a modern democratic society—there is no excuse for it—but the fact is that X number of people vote for Sinn Fein. I do not like that, but they have the right to do so. We must try to get the political representatives of that section of the voters into the negotiating process—that is what I am supporting, but I am not supporting the inclusion of violence. It is all right to say that they have a record of violence—I fully accept that. That is why I speak with trepidation in front of our Northern Ireland colleagues—they have lived with the situation for the past 25 or 26 years.

[Mr. McAvoy]

If we are going to move forward, we have to try to get those people who vote for Sinn Fein to join in the democratic process and not to support a party that condones or supports violence. If we can get Sinn Fein to agree to the six Mitchell principles and then it reneges, the vast majority of people who vote for it will cease to do so—that would destroy its credibility. It has been said that Sinn Fein has no credibility, but that is not quite true.

We know that Sinn Fein has a certain amount of credibility in the international community—I do not agree with it or like it—because it is seen to represent a "victimised" section of the community in Northern Ireland. We should try to move forward and get Sinn Fein there, so long as it accepts the six Mitchell principles. I have no hesitation in saying that if Sinn Fein does not accept that, it is finished.

I thank the hon. and learned Member for North Down (Mr. McCartney) for his intervention. It illustrated the over-concentration by our Northern Ireland colleagues on the meaning and weight of every single word. The hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) said that every single word has a nuance and a Northern Ireland context. There is a paranoid suspicion that every single word from the Government is somehow selling Northern Ireland into the hands of the nationalists in Dublin.

It always surprises me—as an outsider looking in—that the Unionist community in Northern Ireland, by the clear definition of number, influence and long history, is a force to be reckoned with. They are there, there are a million of them and they are in a strong position. The Unionist community should show a hand of strength and reconciliation to the nationalist community, not in the terms of master and servant, but from a position of strength. The community is in a position of strength—no one will ever force it out of the United Kingdom and the Irish Republic as long as that volume of people are there. I would like to see the Unionist community draw some more self-confidence from within itself and make more gestures towards a nationalist community.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The hon. Gentleman should realise that, if the majority's voice is not allowed to be heard in a free and democratic vote, suspicion is caused. Look at the history. When were the Unionist people consulted about the Anglo-Irish Agreement, or the Downing street declaration, or even the framework document? I will not sit at a table with a framework document on it and negotiate it. It is a one-way street—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has read it—to a united Ireland. I am not going to unite Ireland. It must be understood, therefore, that the people of Northern Ireland are rejecting it because we were to have a referendum every 10 years. That disappeared. Twenty years have gone and we have not had a referendum. If the right of the people to express their wishes is taken away, that will cause them to have suspicions.

Mr. McAvoy: Nothing that I have said would indicate that I am trying to take away anyone's right to vote. Where we are now—with the forum and then the negotiating body—is where we are going, and it encompasses voting. I do not oppose that. I say to the hon. Gentleman—I shall choose my words very carefully—that I think he does not take into account enough the historical and social circumstances that led to the creation of the Northern Ireland state with its almost solidified voting intentions.

Having said that, I would like to move on because too often in these debates we start to talk about past events. I hope that I have answered some of the points that the hon. Gentleman raised.

Dr. Godman: I ask my hon. Friend to put to one side our experience of the Scottish travelling circus—the Scottish Grand Committee. Does he support my view that the Bill should be amended in such a way as to enable the forum to meet and convene meetings in various locations?

Mr. McAvoy: Yes, both in the Irish Republic and in other areas of the United Kingdom. I should like there to be a strong and confident assembly, Parliament or whatever it will be called, to go forward in a confident manner to the Irish Republic and deal with the Dublin Government as two Governments within one Ireland—as close neighbours. I think a self-confident community in Northern Ireland would do that.

I share the concern about the proliferation of parties and their names. I usually do not give much sympathy to the Liberal Democrat party, but even I almost feel sorry for it. I understand the problem with the names. I see from the list that there is a party that is just called Labour. There is a genuine debate as to whether the Labour party should become organised in Northern Ireland, but that issue is for a separate debate.

The party called Labour has absolutely nothing to do with the Labour party. If Labour gets a ridiculous vote, no one should claim that the Labour party should not become organised in Northern Ireland. By the same token, if Labour gets a high vote, no one should claim that the Labour party should become organised in Northern Ireland. That is not relevant to the debate because Labour has nothing to do with the Labour party—I make that very clear.

I sympathise with our Unionist colleagues in relation to the parties with minority interests and Unionist names. That will cause confusion. Having recognised those fears and having some knowledge—obviously, not the expert knowledge of some colleagues—of Northern Ireland, I must say that I feel that the electorate will see through what is going on and will make sure that they vote for who they want to vote for. We should not fall into the trap of underestimating the electorate in Northern Ireland, as politicians sometimes do.

I take the point of my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East about the forum and the negotiating body. He and our Unionist colleagues should bear in mind—I am trying not to head back to the past—what will happen if the House of Commons solidifies the voting intentions and patterns of Northern Ireland into a negotiating body. There are genuine fears, which I share, that the process will not result in a settlement that will be broadly acceptable to the mass of the people in Northern Ireland. I can understand that some Unionist colleagues may regard that comment as an insult. They may feel that they are not trusted. There is tremendous resentment, which I have picked up, because Unionist colleagues do not feel trusted by the rest of us. That is something with which we have to live; that is where we are.

The hon. Member for Belfast, East and other Unionist Members should understand that the view that I have described is taken with reluctance, but there have been failures; there have been mistakes. We understand that. It is because of previous failures that there has been a failure to arrive at genuine consensus.

Mr. Robert McCartney: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, to a large extent, it is the national parties in this place which have contributed to communal politics in Northern Ireland, in so far as someone like me, who supports the socio-economic politics of Labour, and is a British citizen, is incapable of becoming a member of the Labour party? If there is a wish for political miscegenation, it is time that something was done to bring it about.

Mr. McAvoy: New Labour might even reach the far-flung province of Devizes. We never know what will happen.

At the risk of sounding intellectual, we are collectively responsible, in a sense, for all the faults and problems of our society. I think that the Social Democratic and Labour party would accept that. We are all responsible also to ensure that the men and women of violence do not destroy the process that lies before us. In a different context, it seems clear that in Israel and Palestine, the extremists on either side of the conflict are determined to sabotage any chance of peace in the middle east by means of explosions, assassinations, terrorism and violence generally.

We must ensure that we do not overreact to events of the sort that took place last night. It is clear that someone was intent on trying to send a message to the House. The explosion took place fewer than 24 hours before we began consideration of the Bill. It was a disgrace. We should not bow down to the men and women of violence by allowing such an incident to throw us off track.

I admire the Secretary of State for the determined and thorough way in which he has clung on and pursued the peace process. The same can be said for the rest of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's ministerial team. We must ensure that we in this place do not allow the men and women of violence to divert us. There is a rough road ahead. The forum and the negotiating body will be only the start of a long process. I wish the Government well in that respect. I shall support the process that lies ahead. History will judge how we reacted to it. That is not to say that the Bill and the ground rules are perfect. However, they represent the only process in front of us, and I have no hesitation in saying that the process should be supported.

8.3 pm

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): My party and I welcome the concept of elections to a forum from which negotiators will be able to try to bring about solutions to the political problems of Northern Ireland. We cannot, however, ignore the recent past, during which we have endeavoured to negotiate our way through a non-elected body. In 1992, we had the unhappy experience of putting a great deal of effort into negotiations that fell apart because some parties did not have a mandate from the electorate. Many of them were present with another agenda, one entirely different from the main agenda to which my party sought to adhere.

It is no secret that the Social Democratic and Labour party has produced some genuine negotiators, but the SDLP has an autocratic management. The progress that was made for days on end was suddenly undermined when the leader of the SDLP arrived on the scene. We now understand why that happened. There was an entirely different sideshow, of which we were unaware at the time. The hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) was engaged in negotiations with Sinn Fein. Before anyone decides that that is worth defending and that those negotiations brought about a ceasefire that endured for 17 months—we are always happy if there is no violence; when we awake and find that no violence has taken place, it is an occasion on which to thank God—it is now clear, as history has proven, that it was not a genuine ceasefire.

The intentions of the leader of the SDLP, the hon. Member for Foyle, were no doubt of the utmost integrity, but he let down the peace process that took place in 1994. He did not draw the terrorists into a permanent ceasefire. Instead, he opened a window of opportunity for them to exploit the political situation at the very moment when they, the terrorists, were coming under stress and strain. It was a time when their organisation was leaking and when the rate of attrition by the Royal Ulster Constabulary was the highest that it had ever been. It was a time when the IRA was running out of funds. The window of political opportunity was open.

Bearing in mind what happened last night in London, we see the outcome of negotiations in which those taking part were not directly and specifically mandated by the electorate. I shall return to the significance of what has happened over the past few months, including what happened last night.

My party is disquieted, to put it mildly, by the form of election that the Government have proposed. I seldom agree with the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), but he rightly said that we have never had an election in the United Kingdom based on party names. We have never voted for parties. People in Northern Ireland vote for people. It is people voting for people who sustain democracy. That system makes the process meaningful. It is an approach that creates accountability for us all. Each one of us is accountable to his or her electorate. Our electorates identify with us because they have chosen us as individuals. To ask the electorate to vote for a party is to play into the hands of parties that have an autocratic structure. We all know which those parties are in Northern Ireland. We have heard a Member of one of those parties this evening say that it is not good enough to have the party name, because one must be able to identify the party for the electorate, and ask how it is proposed to identify that specific party for the electorate. A party leader's name will be introduced on the ballot paper.

What is happening is the antithesis of democracy as we know it. It is a slap-happy and shoddy way of dealing with the needs of society in Northern Ireland. It is driving people into particular camps. People are not being given the opportunity to have a second choice. Some people's first choice may be to vote for Ulster Unionism, but their second choice might well be across the traditional divide and a vote for the SDLP, or vice versa. I am sure that that could and should happen, but we do not have that opportunity now. One is asked to stake one's future within a particular camp. One X for a political party. It is wrong.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does my hon. Friend admit that such people will not necessarily be transferring from one party to another, but moving from one candidate to another whom they know?

Mr. Maginnis: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is the nature of society in Northern Ireland, despite our long-held distrust, one tradition of the other. The distrust has to do with not knowing who the baddies are within the other tradition, so one damns the other tradition. The ability to vote for a candidate within the single transferable vote system allows an individual the opportunity to pick within another tradition. There is a tendency to vote for one's own as a first choice, but the second choice might be to vote for the decent fellow or lady from the other tradition. We have lost that opportunity.

That is sad when one considers the difficulties that we shall encounter the day and hour that we sit down in the forum. We have the difficulty of whether people standing for election will genuinely eschew violence. What, I wonder, shall we do when a Sinn Fein-IRA candidate—the sort of person whom I mentioned earlier in an intervention—arrives and signs the declaration in private, gives it to the returning officer and says, "I am now a candidate under the Sinn Fein banner"? Or that may be done under the banner of some other paramilitary organisation.

One thing that we must ensure is that the declaration is made not just in private, but in a more public way so that, at the very outset of the operation of the forum, a document is read publicly in a fashion similar to that which occurs in the House when new Members take the oath either by swearing on the Bible or by affirming. If such a document can enshrine the principles that derive from the Mitchell report, there will at least be further evidence for the public at large that the Government are endeavouring to ensure that genuine people are being charged with and made responsible for the negotiations and those things pertaining to negotiations from within the forum.

I talked about the difficulties that we shall encounter. Let us consider for a moment what happened last night. Some people dismiss it almost as a signal. It was more than a signal. IRA-Sinn Fein have discovered that there is nothing for them within the democratic process. They have been wedded for ever, it seems, to the violence that they have perpetrated for 26 years. They have discovered something that rather disconcerts them—that the people of Northern Ireland and the people of the United Kingdom will withstand their violence for as long as they have to. They recognise that Sinn Fein has the support of only 4.8 per cent. of the electorate, because 95 per cent. of the people have not voted for Sinn Fein-IRA. I do not exclude loyalist paramilitaries or their horrible deeds from my criticism, but they have never attracted even 1 per cent. of the support of the total electorate.

The IRA will not win militarily and it must decide whether to continue killing for the sake of killing; whether to continue its violence for the sake of violence. It does not seem to make sense. Therefore, it considers how it can exploit the political scene. That, believe it or not, has been its first and major mistake. The day and hour that it entered the political arena was the beginning of the defeat of the IRA. I do not use the word defeat to incite it to further violence. I know that it can kill tonight or tomorrow night. What I am saying is that it has lost the intellectual and the ideological argument that somehow, from days of yore, motivated its movement.

If that is the case, the IRA has compounded its difficulty by moving into the international arena because, by doing so, it has placed itself under the scrutiny of the international community. What will the international community say if, once again, it moves into a ceasefire insincerely and then backs out into its violence?

The IRA's dilemma is not whether it moves from violence to the democratic process. If that was its problem, it would have been resolved by the setting of the date for all-party talks which it demanded. Once it got that, it realised its true dilemma, which is at what level to pitch its violence today and tomorrow so as to retain some of the sympathy and the folklore that has sustained it from the United States and elsewhere.

That brings us to the real function of the election and the forum. Because, hear what I say, the IRA is defeated. It is finished. It has nothing to offer. It is, therefore, to the constitutional nationalists, more than the Unionists, more than the Government, more than the House, that the responsibility falls. What do they want for Ireland?

We have heard powerful and effective words about how we share the island. It all sounds very good. We have listened to and read over and over the words of the Downing street declaration—the will of the people of Northern Ireland first and foremost; the consent that is necessary. What does it mean if it does not assume some sort of tangible form in respect of the day-to-day affairs of society in Northern Ireland—how an administration can function in order to serve that society more effectively?

As we move into elections, as a Unionist, I feel no sense of shame, of having unnecessarily to humble myself, in appealing to the constitutional nationalist parties throughout Ireland, including the Government in Dublin and all the other constitutional nationalist parties in the Irish Republic, to examine exactly what they mean when they say to us, "We want to be your neighbours. We want to work with you. We recognise the democratic right of the people of Northern Ireland to consent to their own future." Can they show us what they mean by that? Do the Social Democratic and Labour party, a very powerful and influential party in Northern Ireland, and the other constitutional nationalist parties, realise the potential that there is in coming together within a forum?

Can the Secretary of State not see, when he looks at the purpose for which the forum is being elected, that he will deprive society in Northern Ireland of an opportunity to live and work together politically if he restricts the time for which the forum is able to function? I see a contradiction between schedule 2 and clause 3(4) of the Bill, which says:

"But if, in accordance with any rules and procedure adopted by them,"—

the forum—

"the participants in the negotiations refer any matter to the forum, subsection (3) shall not be taken to prevent the forum from considering that matter."

But paragraph 2(3) of schedule 2 says:

"But the forum shall not meet at any time notified by the Secretary of State to the chairman as being a time when, in the opinion of the Secretary of State, it would not be appropriate for the forum to meet because negotiations within section 2 may take place."

The 60 or 70 people sitting in the forum must not be constrained by the other 50—far too many—who are taking part in negotiations. They must be able to work in committees, to support what is being investigated by the negotiators as a possible way forward. There will be times when the negotiators will run up against difficulties and will want to refer the matter to the forum for investigation, for the taking of evidence. That is an important role, and it will continue to involve those who elect members. There will be a conditioning of our entire society, I hope, for some form of agreement, whereby each tradition will know that it will not get everything that it wants, and that reality need not come as a shock at the end of the process. People need to know what is happening and to have confidence in what is happening as we move through the process.

My final point arises from paragraph 8(2) of schedule 1. Why is T, in the formula for arriving at a quota, the total number of votes given? The total number of votes given is never the number of votes used in arriving at a quota. It is the number of valid votes cast. With our particularly complicated list, on which we shall have to vote if the Bill is passed, there will be an awful lot of spoiled votes. If we take the total votes given, which is what the Secretary of State suggests, the quota will be so high that it will take an inordinate number of counts to elect people. We do not want that.

This election fills me with hope on the one hand and fear and trepidation on the other, because if we—whether it be the SDLP, the Democratic Unionist party, the Ulster Unionist party or people from the multitude of other parties—are to make progress, we must be allowed to do so in our own right and not be constrained by consideration for those who are wedded to violence and who cannot be prised from it.

8.26 pm

Ms Judith Church (Dagenham): I apologise to the House and to the Secretary of State for missing his speech this afternoon, but I was detained on constituency business.

Having learnt of the ill health of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), I send my best wishes to him, and hope that he will make a speedy return to us. I am sure that the whole House will wish to join me in that.

We should acknowledge tonight the great toll that the work load in terms of the peace process takes on hon. Members, particularly those from Northern Ireland and those on both Front Benches. [Interruption.] I was not going to propose a pay rise, although I can see that some of my hon. Friends are a bit eager. It is a very heavy work load, and we must congratulate hon. Members on the tremendous progress that is being made, despite the difficulties.

I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) in supporting the Secretary of State over last night's bombing. We all agree that such atrocities are as pointless as they are destructive, and they have no place in a civilised debate on the future of Northern Ireland.

The Bill presents us with a concrete opportunity to take the peace process forward and to develop a path to real dialogue between the parties involved. Naturally, we support that aim, and anything that might bring it about. There are, however, a number of areas in the Bill that need clarification.

The first, as a number of hon. Members have said, is the status of the proposed forum. The House and the British people are conscious of the burden of history in Northern Ireland. We are all concerned that the forum should not develop into an assembly controlled by one community, which would serve to divide the peoples of the Province rather than unite them. In that context, we would like more detail on the precise role and function of the forum and how it will work. I know that the way in which it will work will depend on the will, determination and commitment of the forum's members, but, given the number of hon. Members who have raised the issue today, the Minister may wish to tell us a little more.

Secondly, there is the problem referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar—the under-representation of women in Northern Ireland's political life. Of course, that is not peculiar to Northern Ireland; before what I just said is taken up, let me add that only 10 per cent. of Members of Parliament are women. But there are no female Northern Ireland Members, and I believe that only about 10 per cent. of Northern Ireland's councillors are women. We have not achieved equality in councils elsewhere in the United Kingdom, but we are fast approaching that point, and there has been a substantial increase in the number of women who take part in our democratic life at every level.

In the context of the troubles, it is understandable that this issue has not yet achieved any great prominence, but I think that it is an important element of Northern Ireland's political development. If any organisation, state, part of a state or community is to develop politically into a mature democratic forum, every part of the community must be represented. In particular, women need to be represented in our elected bodies.

Mr. Maginnis: I could not agree more. On the basis of the hon. Lady's experience of her party, can she tell us how we might make progress?

Ms Church: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman asked me that. No doubt his question could form the basis of a lengthy debate—but you will be pleased to learn, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have no intention of allowing that to happen.

I know that there is no quick fix, but, given the rate of progress in the House before our party developed strategies to increase the representation of women, it would take us between 250 and 300 years to achieve parity in the House. I do not expect equality of representation in the House to come about in my lifetime—although I intend to live for a long time, despite what some may think or wish—but I hope that we will improve considerably on the current 10 per cent. Of course, much of the problem is caused by the culture of all the political parties.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): What would be the implications if Northern Ireland adopted one of the strategies of the hon. Lady's party for bringing more women to Parliament? Emily's List requires those standing for election to state in writing that they are in favour of abortion.

Ms Church: That is a difficult issue. Anyone wishing to gain sponsorship from Emily's List must make that commitment, but, as the hon. Gentleman must know, that is not the only method that Labour has used to increase the representation of women.

[Ms Church]

For a long time, organisations such as the Northern Ireland Women's European Platform and the Downtown Women's Centre have struggled to deal with the problem of female under-representation, but there has been little public recognition of their work. The presence of the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition on the election lists is welcome, but that must be built on: we must increase the number of women who participate in the Province's political life, as political candidates rather than people who are merely part of the coalition.

A merging process must take place. The Government, and members of all political parties, have a responsibility to ensure that that happens. I know that it is not top of the list of priorities in the peace process, but I feel that, for the sake of the long-term health of Northern Ireland and of democracy in the House of Commons, we need more balanced representation.

My third point, which has already been mentioned, relates to the electoral system that has been chosen for the forum. I agree with much of what was said by the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis). I have been interested in electoral and constitutional reform for a long time. Last night, the all-party group in favour of constitutional reform held its initial meeting in the House, and I think that those of us who believe that constitutional and electoral reform are an important part of the House's agenda are beginning to act more collectively.

I do not want to make a specific party point, but let me point out that Labour is the only political party in the country that has spent a long time examining electoral systems in general. It set up the Plant commission, which sat for three years and produced a comprehensive review of all the work that had been done on electoral reform. I do not wish to bore for Britain on the issue of electoral systems—perhaps it would be more appropriate to say "bore for the United Kingdom"—but we must have consensus. We must recognise that there is no perfect electoral system. The electoral system that is adopted depends on the functions of the elected body, and on what we wish it to do.

The commission, under the excellent chairmanship of Lord Plant, spent a long time examining all the existing electoral systems around the world. Some of its members went to Germany, and we had representations from Australia, New Zealand, Israel and many other countries whose electoral systems are different from the predominant UK systems—first past the post, and, in Northern Ireland, the single transferable vote.

We did not, of course, have an opportunity to consider the electoral system that the Bill proposes. It is an innovation. We all agreed, however, that it requires some mathematical ability to think through the way in which an electoral system might work. Those who are not of a mathematical bent may be put off by what the formulae in clauses 8 and 9 would mean in practice. A good deal of education will be needed. I am fortunate in having a degree in mathematics, but I have sometimes found the subject difficult, nevertheless.

Three years is a long time in which to examine electoral systems as a member of a commission. We have not that much time in which to decide on the right electoral system for the forum: if it took as long as that, the peace process would be halted for a long period. In a sense, the right electoral system must be plucked out of the air. I do not know whether the Secretary of State will agree with me, but I suspect that the proposal in the Bill has been plucked out of the air; it has certainly not been plucked out of any textbook.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): Does the hon. Lady agree that, as there is so much at stake for all of us in Northern Ireland, within the United Kingdom and within these islands, we should not be made guinea pigs yet again?

Ms Church: When a new system is introduced, somebody has to be the guinea pig. The difficulty is that none of the existing electoral systems, which were clearly considered by the Government, suited the purpose of the forum. Perhaps the Minister will want to speak about that.

"Guinea pigs" is not exactly the right term for the proposed system, which will, I hope, address many concerns. Of course it will not be perfect, but the electoral system matters. One of the dangers in proposing a new system quickly, which is what has happened here, is that it may end up being permanent. The hon. Members for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) and for Fermanagh and South Tyrone spoke about that, and my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) spoke about the Palestinian elections.

We must make progress, and we cannot let the difficulty of arriving at a system hold us back. That does not mean that we should not point out difficulties in trying to explain the system to the electorate. Electoral systems are complicated, and part of political progress must be political education, so that the electorate understands how democracy works. If we do not do that, we have failed.

This is a contentious issue. If it were not, it would not be debated at such length, and I would not have spoken about it as I have. I do not criticise the Government for proposing this electoral system. I have not had time to look closely at it and at the criteria, but I hope that somebody did that before proposing this system in the Bill. The system may not be perfect, but we must ensure that it is as close as we can make it. Some amendment may be needed to achieve that.

Politicians must never forget that the people will ultimately decide on whether the peace process is a success or a failure. As a result of the Bill, they will shortly be given the opportunity to voice their views and to give their consent to the next steps in the process. That is wonderful progress, and, despite some of the criticisms, it will reassure the citizens of Northern Ireland—which is perhaps what they need above all—that the peace process is being moved forward. That will help to allay their concern that the process was not moving as rapidly as it should.

We look forward to continuing progress, so that the cause of peace can be advanced. The Bill should be implemented as quickly as possible. It has maximum support, and we must make sure that elections take place in as peaceful an atmosphere as possible. In the light of last night's event, we must reiterate that the House will not be moved from the path to peace in Northern Ireland. None of us will bow to that sort of pressure, and we reject the people who believe that such pressures are any part of the democratic process. Clearly they are not.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): In the lengthy run-up to this debate, there has been much rancour and criticism from all sides in Northern Ireland about the issue of a proposed forum and all-party negotiations. However, noticeable features of the debate have been the measured contributions from hon. Members on all sides, the thought that went into the speeches, and, at times, the good humour. This has been a good launching pad for the electoral process that the people of Ulster are about to enjoy. People in Northern Ireland will at last have the chance to speak, to express their views on Northern Ireland soil.

I join those colleagues who have mentioned the brief illness of my Member of Parliament, the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). Although he knows that, for obvious reasons, I do not vote for him, he is my Member of Parliament, and on a personal level we have a very good relationship. I wish him a speedy recovery and a quick return to the House. I am disappointed that he is not here for the debate, because, for the past few months, he has been giving good leadership to the nationalist people of Northern Ireland as we try to bring all communities into the political process.

This is an interesting and historical moment for the people of Northern Ireland. We have had 25 years of terrible events and tragedies, from which few families in Northern Ireland have escaped. We want an opportunity to put that in the past and to build a new future, in which everyone in Northern Ireland can enjoy a free, democratic society and the benefits that flow from that.

We in the Ulster Unionist party welcome a Bill that provides for elections in Northern Ireland. We stand firmly behind the principle of consent for the people of Northern Ireland. That principle should be underlined time and again in the debate, because if it is not accepted, the process will fail.

We were disappointed to note that, in the nominated forum in the Republic of Ireland, among the nationalist people of Ireland the principle of consent could not be accepted by all the participating parties. That is a bad omen for what is about to take place in Northern Ireland, and I hope that, when we have our forum, which will have been created by the people of Northern Ireland themselves, we shall have greater success in establishing the principle of consent and of having it accepted by all the participating parties.

In addition to the principle of consent, there is the principle of decommissioning. I was glad to hear the speeches by hon. Members in all parts of the House, but I was disappointed to note that only three Conservative Back Benchers have attended this historic debate on the future of part of the United Kingdom. Only one Conservative member of the Northern Ireland Select Committee was present. That reflects badly on the interests of the Conservative party; and the presence and participation of Labour Members was little better.

However, I pay tribute to the Prime Minister for the way in which he has placed Northern Ireland at the top of his agenda in 10 Downing street. He is the first Prime Minister for many years who has given priority to the difficult issue of politics in Northern Ireland, to the issue of relations within the island of Ireland, and to the totality of the relationship within the British Isles. We should also pay tribute to the Leader of the Opposition for his bipartisan support for the efforts of the Prime Minister, to try to steer us in Northern Ireland into a situation where we can build the foundations upon which there will be lasting peace and reconciliation within our community.

While I am expressing my appreciation of the leaders of both the Conservative and Labour parties, it would be remiss of an Ulster Unionist to ignore the role of the Government of the Republic of Ireland, and, in particular, the present Prime Minister, Mr. Bruton. Although I disagree with his Government's point of view, Mr. Bruton's approach has been measured and reasonable—at times. At other times, we have had to criticise him severely, but it is only fair to place on record the fact that he has been endeavouring to help to create the conditions in which nationalists and Unionists within Northern Ireland can have a better future.

I referred to the tragic years of the troubles, and we later had the ceasefire of 1994. There were those—including the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—who, on a weekly basis, stated that the ceasefire would collapse next weekend, or at Christmas, or at Easter, or new year or any other date they could think of. Nevertheless, the people of Northern Ireland enjoyed peace for almost 18 months.

If the people of Northern Ireland had been given the chance to speak last September—as they now will be—when the idea for elections was first proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble), it is likely that the ceasefire would not have collapsed. But people stalled on the electoral process, and the main opposition came from the Dublin Government and the leader of the SDLP, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume). They are partly responsible for contributing to a situation in which—regrettably—the ceasefire in the United Kingdom collapsed.

We must not recriminate about the past, and we welcome the Bill that is now before us. We also have Cmnd. 3232. I want to ask the Secretary of State—or the Minister in his reply—to explain and clarify some queries that I and my colleagues have. Paragraph 1 of Cmnd. 3232 deals with the basis for negotiations, and refers to "relationships within Northern Ireland, within the island of Ireland and between the peoples of these islands".

That is an important phrase. Paragraph 5, which deals with the structure of negotiations and refers to strands 1, 2 and 3, does not say that strand 3 covers the relationship between the peoples of the islands—rather, it restricts strand 3 to being simply relationships between the two Governments.

There is a big difference between the totality of relationships between the peoples of these islands and the narrower issue of the relationship between the British and Irish Governments. I would like some clarification from the Minister that, in the negotiations that will probably take place from 10 June onwards, we will be able to discuss the totality of the relationships between the peoples of these islands, and not simply how the two Governments will co-operate.

Paragraph 3 says:

"Any participant in the strand in question will be free to raise any aspect of the three relationships, including constitutional issues".

I thought that we had been told by the Secretary of State and by the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland that the Republic would have no role whatsoever in the internal affairs of Northern Ireland, and would therefore not be participating or involved in the strand 1 talks. What does paragraph 3 mean? It seems to imply that the Dublin Government will have a role—including on constitutional issues—in strand 1. We must have further clarification on that issue, so that my doubts can be pushed to the side.

We in the UUP welcome paragraph 4, which emphasises that both the United Kingdom and southern Irish Governments

"as signatories of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, reaffirm that they would be prepared to consider a new and more broadly based agreement".

We certainly want to see a replacement for the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which today—11 years after its imposition on the people of Northern Ireland—is resented as strongly as it has ever been.

Paragraph 18 deals with the format, and states:

"Negotiations will address all three interlocking sets of relationships as a totality. Negotiations in each of the three interlocking strands will open on the same day and proceed in parallel."

It adds that negotiating sessions in different strands will not be held simultaneously.

Does that mean that, on the first day, all three strands will meet one after the other or at the same time? One set of negotiators for a party can hardly attend three sets of negotiations at the same time. On the first day, will we have a strand 1 meeting from 9 am to coffee time, a strand 2 meeting from coffee time to lunchtime and a strand 3 meeting from lunchtime to afternoon tea time?

Mr. Trimble: And the rest of the day off.

Mr. Taylor: Yes. The first day seems slightly confusing, and we need to have greater clarification.

Paragraph 20 refers to negotiations on strand 2, and states:

"formal meetings will be chaired by an independent Chairperson operating procedural rules, agreed by the participants."

The participants will agree the rules, but who will agree on the independent chairperson? Who will recommend that chairperson? How will he be appointed? Are the Government in a position to suggest a name tonight? We have seen names being suggested in Dublin.

I hope that this matter will be left to the people of Northern Ireland through their elected representatives and negotiators to agree among themselves. But the Minister has a responsibility tonight to define more clearly how that person will be appointed. [Interruption.] It could not be Mr. Dick Spring. I just heard hon. Members on the Labour Front Bench recommending him. I have already defined the standing of that honourable gentleman in Northern Ireland, and I do not think that I should expand on that. I could not consider him to be independent.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): The right hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Having read the Bill carefully, I am worried that it does not say how the chairman should be appointed. It should be for the forum to appoint the chairman in a general meeting. The Government might take that on board, because those who participate and negotiate should appoint somebody who is not a member of the United Kingdom Government, the Irish Government or a Member from Northern Ireland. It should be somebody who is totally independent, and who comes to it with a fresh mind.

Mr. Taylor: I very much welcome that contribution. It underlines my point that the procedure is not defined with sufficient clarity. We need a genuinely independent chairman who is respected by the elected representatives within the forum.

Paragraph 22 of Cmnd. 3232 refers, rightly, to the business committee. We need some guidance from the Minister about the size of that committee. Will there be one representative from each of the two Governments and one from each of the political parties, or is some other formula being suggested?

Paragraph 23 is a mistake by the Government, repeating that old and failed formula that nothing is agreed until everything is agreed. That was one of the contributory factors in the collapse of the Brooke all-party talks at Stormont. I regret that one of the reasons for the failure of those talks is being repeated in the Command Paper. I appeal to the Government, even at this late stage, to remove that obstacle to real progress within Northern Ireland.

Paragraph 26 is entitled "Validation". It states that both Governments should "reaffirm their intention that the outcome of negotiations will be submitted for public approval by referendums in Ireland—North and South".

Can we have confirmation from the Minister that, whether or not there is a referendum in the Republic, the referendum within Northern Ireland will be separate, limited to the people of Northern Ireland and under the legislation of Northern Ireland and the United Kingdom?

Clause 4(5) deals with the issue of there being no court. I realise that that refers specifically to referendums. It says:

"No court shall entertain any proceedings for questioning the numbers as certified by the Chief Electoral Officer for Northern Ireland . . . of any ballot papers counted or answers given in a referendum."

If no court is being allowed to interfere, that will be most unusual, because we have electoral courts in all elections in the United Kingdom. It is very odd that there should be a specific exclusion of the court to overrule the chief electoral officer if people wish to challenge any decisions.

Although the clause refers specifically to the referendum, I trust that there is no suggestion that the electoral court will be prevented from overriding the chief electoral officer in the electoral process to the forum. That would be a serious infringement of normal democratic practices.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Will my right hon. Friend accept that, although the draftsmen deliberately excluded the question of the border referendum at an earlier stage, they may have been thinking that the result of the referendum would be so overwhelming, like that previous referendum, that no court could overturn it? Having said that, I accept my right hon. Friend's point about the electoral process to the forum.

Mr. Taylor: I thank my hon. Friend for that contribution, and for the way in which he has developed the point I was trying to make.

We were promised referendums under the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973, and we did have one. However, since the Unionists won, we have not been allowed to have another one. That is the way that democracy has operated in Northern Ireland since 1972. Any time the Unionists win something, it is immediately dropped and some other attempt is made, where it is hoped that the Unionists will not win.

This Bill is yet another example of that. Its whole thrust is to weaken the unity of the Ulster Unionist people. I assure the Secretary of State that, when the election takes place, the Ulster Unionist people will rise up to a man and to a woman, and there will be one of the biggest turnouts in Northern Ireland's electoral history. There will be a strong Unionist and loyalist mandate, because the people will rejoice at this opportunity to speak—and speak loudly they will.

Mr. Bermingham: One of the grounds on which a ballot should be able to be challenged is that of electoral fraud. We all know about voting from the grave—I say that as a born Dubliner—

Mr. Taylor: So you would know.

Mr. Bermingham: Yes, I know it well enough. That is what worries me about the clause.

Mr. Taylor: I certainly know what the hon. Gentleman is talking about. That cannot happen in Northern Ireland, although it still may happen in the Republic. We have strict controls in Northern Ireland; people have to produce one of 10 types of identification document. Some of them include photographs, which is sensible, while others do not, which is not so sensible.

The Government should look again at the whole question of identification on polling day in Northern Ireland elections. Quite often, a married couple will turn up at a polling station. The man has his driving licence, which, in Northern Ireland, carries a photograph, but his wife has forgotten to bring an identification document. So the returning officer tells the wife that she cannot vote, but her husband can—with the result that both of them walk away without voting, because the husband will not vote if his wife is not allowed to. So both votes are lost.

Mr. Beggs: In some parts of Northern Ireland, because of a lack of proper scrutiny within the precincts where voting takes place of those coming in to vote, we cannot be certain that multiple voting by some parties does not take place. Would my right hon. Friend agree with that?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend is correct. The hon. Member for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron), who is in his place, can confirm what is unfortunately happening in some parts of his constituency.

Clause 5 includes the interesting term "nominating representative". It is said that that means

"the person who . . . appears to the Secretary of State to be the leader of the party".

So it is not up to members of a party to decide who is their leader; it is the Secretary of State who will decide.

It was the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) who said that the electoral system proposed in this Bill exists nowhere else in the world. First, parties have to be named, and then the Secretary of State decides which ones he will allow to fight the election. There is a rumour in Northern Ireland that President Yeltsin is looking closely at this legislation and is encouraged by it.

I think that the "nominating representative" phraseology has to do with internal Conservative party politics. It is designed to overcome divisions in the Conservative party. That party in Northern Ireland wants to fight the election on a policy opposed to what the Secretary of State stands for. So the Secretary of State is presenting one policy, while Conservative candidates in Northern Ireland present a different one. We therefore do not know who will speak for the Conservatives.

So how do the Government propose to get around this problem? They will let the Conservative party compete in the election, but once it is over, the Secretary of State will decide who will represent the winning Conservative candidates. He will select himself as the possible leader of Conservative members.

Clause 5(1) refers to

"the person who . . . appears to the Secretary of State to be the leader of the party or otherwise the most appropriate person to act on behalf of the party for the purposes of this Act."

Who does the Secretary of State have in mind as "the most appropriate person" to act for the Conservative party? I suspect that it will not be any Conservative who is elected in Northern Ireland, but that the Secretary of State would prefer to be "the appropriate person".

Rev. Ian Paisley: Surely the right hon. Gentleman is aware that the paper given to us in discussion stated that the chairman of the Conservative party was placed to be the leader. When the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney) became the chairman of the Conservative party, we were told that he was the most appropriate person. When I spoke to him today, he said, "They will be able to stand because I will accredit them, but they will not be allowed to negotiate."

Mr. Taylor: This is another one for President Yeltsin. People will be allowed to stand in an election but, once they win, they will not be allowed to participate in the negotiations. The Government must end that scandal, and amend the Bill. There is no way in which we can rig electoral systems in Northern Ireland in such a manner.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's point, but perhaps he is being uncharacteristically judgmental. It may not be a campaign to "dump the doctor", but some of the strange parties that have been brought into existence may not know their leaders. It would be up to the Secretary of State to appoint that person.

Mr. Taylor: The point is well made. We are beginning to see the contradictions in the Bill.

Clause 6 provides for the payment of allowances and the Secretary of State's expenses. Obviously allowances will have to be paid to elected persons, because they are not being elected as parliamentarians, district councillors or members of an assembly. We certainly hope that the people elected will contribute to thoughtful negotiations with skill and ability, and they may come from industry, the professions, or the business or academic world. We hope to attract good-quality candidates who are interested in constitutional issues, not routine parliamentary or district council matters such as the needs of individual constituents.

[Mr. Taylor]

The persons who are elected will have to give up some of their regular work, not to enter a lengthy parliamentary career but for one year—or two years at most. I hope that the Minister will give some guidance on the likely allowances for persons elected to the forum and the negotiating bodies.

We are entering the pre-nomination day period and time is short. The Bill is moving quickly through the House this week and next, and perhaps the Minister can give the date of nomination day. We have heard when the all-party talks will begin and know the date of the election, but I do not recall hearing the date for nomination day. I suspect that, when we know, we will all be shocked at how little time we have to select candidates and complete nomination papers.

Mr. Barnes: I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman has considered the persons who may stand as candidates. Schedule 1 makes provision for disqualifying certain persons, but it does not state which persons will qualify to stand as candidates. As a candidate can be anyone appointed by the leader of any of the 33 parties, theoretically it would be possible for a Teachta Dála from Dublin, myself or any other hon. Member to be nominated. An amendment is required to stop that happening, and I have just submitted it.

Mr. Taylor: That is a very good point, and no doubt the Minister has heard it and will respond. I trust that the reply will be that candidates must be on the electoral register in Northern Ireland, but we will have to wait and see what he says.

Paragraph 4 of schedule 1 concerns the franchise, which I mentioned in an earlier intervention. I still cannot understand why an election that is based on parliamentary constituencies does not use the criteria for the parliamentary franchise as its basis. According to this system, the election will be based on Westminster constituencies, but we will ignore the Westminster electoral roll and instead use the district council electoral roll. That seems to be a rather peculiar decision, and I should like to know the explanation for it.

Paragraph 5 of schedule 1 is about parties and party lists. Paragraph 6(6) states:

"A party's regional list must include at least two candidates who are not on a constituency list for the party."

There must, again, be some explanation for that peculiar qualification, and I should like to know the Minister's reasoning for including that restriction.

The list of parties in part II of schedule 1 makes very interesting reading, and one could make much play out of it. I shall simply ask the Minister to tell the House how many members there are in the British Ulster Unionist party, how many members there are in the No Going Back party, and when he first heard of those parties. How many members are in the Northern Ireland party—whatever that is—and how many members are in the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition? We require further information on those political parties.

We then come to paragraph 2 of schedule 2, which concerns meetings. Paragraph 2(1) states:

"The first meeting of the forum shall be at a time decided by the Secretary of State."

On the first day, on 10 June, we will have negotiating meetings straight away—strands 1, 2 and 3—but there is no suggestion when the forum might meet. It might meet this Christmas. We require clarification on why no specific date has been stated for the forum. I should have thought that the obvious answer would be for the forum to meet on the first day and for other things to follow from that.

The very last point, paragraph 6 of schedule 2—"Miscellaneous"—states:

"The Secretary of State shall provide for the forum the services of such staff, the use of such premises and such other facilities as he thinks appropriate."

The Secretary of State has told us in this Bill that the negotiating teams will meet at Stormont castle grounds, but he has not told us where the forum will meet. We have heard mention of it going all around the British Isles, but I should like the Government to tell us today where the forum will meet, and to confirm that they have thought this one out and chosen a permanent location for this new Northern Ireland forum for the next two years.

There is a great challenge to all political parties in Northern Ireland—nationalist and Unionist—to practise what they have claimed for so many years. We have had 25 years of violence, and we now have a great opportunity to bring about a negotiated agreement in Northern Ireland that will provide peace, reconciliation and the enjoyment and fulfilment of life for all our people on the basis of consent and the total and absolute rejection of violence. It is an opportunity that should not be missed.

For members of the Ulster Unionist party, this opportunity will secure Northern Ireland in the United Kingdom, and will create the conditions in which Catholics and Protestants, Unionists and nationalists, can work together in the administration and good government of Northern Ireland. It will also create the basis for an enhanced relationship between Dublin and Belfast, a development that is much more logical now, 23 years after we joined the European Union.

We in the Ulster Unionist party will oppose the Bill tonight, for the reasons given by other hon. Members. Conservative Members have condemned some aspects of the Bill. Labour Members have criticised it. The Social Democratic and Labour party and the Democratic Unionist party have criticised it. Our challenge goes out to all those who joined with us in criticising the Bill to join us in the Lobby to register our opposition to the Government. However, I emphasise that we in the Ulster Unionist party will be fighting this election. We welcome it, and we ask the people of Northern Ireland to give us a strong mandate, so that we can secure Northern Ireland for generations to come.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I find it difficult to follow the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor). He intends to vote against the Bill and rely on the rest of us to vote for it so that he can take part in the elections. I promise him that we shall fulfil his intentions.

Until the moment when he said that he intended to vote against the Bill, I thought that there was a great deal of value in the speech of the right hon. Member for Strangford. He raised many of the serious issues in relation to the Bill, which we shall tackle in Committee.

I shall not repeat the points that he made, but he gave a masterly analysis of some of the major points that are in the Bill.

I couple my party with the sentiments of all those who expressed their sadness at the illness of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). We have missed his powerful contribution tonight. We ask those who go to see him in hospital—we hope that it will be a short stay—to convey our good wishes for a speedy recovery. Even if one does not agree with him, he is one of those Members of Parliament whose integrity is appreciated across the House.

The issue tonight is not whether we would start from here. We have to start from here. There is no alternative if we want all-party talks on 10 June. There is little point in talking about the past or how we arrived here. The only way in which we can have all-party talks on 10 June is through the Bill. There is no alternative. That is the central issue. Do we vote for the Bill and have all-party talks on 10 June or vote against it with the clear implication that we do not want all-party talks on 10 June? We may want them at some other time, but it would not be so early as 10 June. That is why we shall support the Bill tonight, although we could add—I may do so myself—to the problems in the Bill.

No one could pretend that the route to the talks has been easy, logical, rational or straightforward, but we are now in a position to open the door to talks through the Bill. We see no point in being critical of past mistakes or wrong turnings. The Mitchell report contains many wise words. One sentence says:

"If the focus remains on the past, the past will become the future."

Those are the words that stick with me. The right hon. Member for Strangford said that there was an opportunity here and that we must put aside the past. That is why, although there have been some recriminations in the debate today, the Opposition's approach rejects recriminations.

We are pleased that in recent weeks the procedures covered by the Bill and the Command Paper have moved in directions of which we have approved. We urge that Mitchell's six principles should be placed on the table at the start of the talks and signed up to by all the participants. Subscribers to peace and democracy will be able to sign up to those principles. The Mitchell report has not been dumped or binned, as was alleged. Those who allege that it has been binned will have most difficulty in facing up to the Mitchell principles. I should like to see them face up to that challenge. We urged that Mitchell's approach to decommissioning should be embraced and followed, and all those who are genuine about abandoning violence will be able to accept that.

We urged the British and Irish Governments to get back together and to act in concert because the peace process moves forward only when that happens. In recent weeks, as the right hon. Member for Strangford pointed out, it has seemed that the two Governments have genuinely worked together in a sense of partnership.

We urged that the electoral process chosen should ensure that the smaller parties—such as the Progressive Unionist party and Ulster Democratic party, which have links with important constituencies—have a place at the negotiating table. The Government have given them that opportunity. That has led to some problems in the electoral process, but we applaud the fact that those parties will have the opportunity to attend the talks. The smaller parties will not have a guaranteed right because they will have to come into the top 10, but they will have the opportunity to be at the talks.

We urged that the whole package should be laid out, not just the Bill for the election process but the ground rules, which are now Cmnd. 3232. We thought that it was important that people should be able to judge the whole scene rather than not know what they were getting into. That has happened.

We urged that the talks and the forum should be separated and that the forum should lose all the connotations of previous majoritarian assemblies. We have moved a long way towards that aim. The forum will be deliberative only and will have no legislative, executive or administrative functions. We believe that the forum could be valuable for building consensus, but that will depend on appropriate rules of procedure. I shall return to that point.

Substantial work remains to be done in Committee. Real progress can be made in Committee, although there is a timetable because the talks must occur on 10 June. The biggest single contribution to the success of 10 June can be made by the IRA with an unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire. It is overwhelmingly clear that that is what the overwhelming majority of the people of Northern Ireland, of the Republic and of the United Kingdom want. The IRA has no mandate whatever from anyone for bombing. It is also important that Sinn Fein is at those talks, although progress could be made without it. Sinn Fein and the IRA have what they have always demanded—a date for all-party talks and a comprehensive agenda. There is no excuse for them not to restore the ceasefire, and they must do that. They must also embrace the Mitchell principles, which present no problems to any democratic party or to other nationalists.

In Committee, a number of issues must be addressed. Many hon. Members have commented on the details of the Bill, but I shall not deal with those now. I am sure that the Minister will wish to refer to some of those comments, but he will shortly have two full days in which to respond.

The Government will want to explain to us the principles on which they have constructed the list of parties. That subject is one of those that has caused most concern, because it seems a little arbitrary to say that there will be a list of parties, some people protest and the Government add more parties. That approach will lead to considerable problems, especially when one bears in mind the independents on the list, but if the House and the members of different parties work together in Committee, we could tidy up the Bill considerably. Suggestions have been made for assenters, deposits or other mechanisms that could be used to solve the problem.

We also have the incongruity that some people will be allowed to put their names on the ballot paper, but others will not. I look forward with keen anticipation to dealing with those issues on Monday and Tuesday.

The major issue that confronts us now is the role of the forum and its style of operation. As we heard from the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), the nationalist community has great difficulty, to put it mildly, in envisaging a role for the forum that adds anything to the talks or to the search for a settlement. It will not take part in anything that has elements of Stormont. A body in which people shout or abuse one another will do nothing to build trust, reconciliation and consensus.

[Mr. Tony Worthington]

During the debate, some hon. Members asked how the House could be against the forum, but if we consider how we conduct our business it is clear that this is not a successful place for constructing consensus. Recently, we have had some success with a dribble of Conservative Members crossing the Floor, but it may take a few more months before they all cross. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), the Chief Whip, is here and I know that he is optimistic about that.

When we want to construct a consensus, we use the Select Committees. Their culture involves an expectation that the members of the Committee, despite coming from different parties and having different views, will try to construct a consensus. That is what the forum is about. There is a role for a forum with terms of reference and procedures that would make it act in the style of a Select Committee.

Mr. Trimble: I am delighted by the hon. Gentleman's points. I take it that he will endorse our suggestion, which we have made regularly in recent months, that the forum should conduct itself analogously to Select Committees by forming committees to take evidence and make factual inquiries on matters relevant to the negotiations to assist the negotiators. Will he join our request to the Government that the committees of the forum should have the powers of Select Committees to summon persons and papers? Those powers would be exercised only to extract information from the Northern Ireland Office that it is jealously refusing to provide.

Mr. Worthington: I find myself agreeing with the hon. Gentleman to a disturbing degree. There is much sense in what he says but he also knows that there is an issue about the rules of procedure. We can construct rules of procedure, such as those that apply in this place, where we normally vote at 10 pm, but that is not a way to construct consensus. There are other rules of procedure whereby the dominant ethos would be the construction of consensus. For the success of the forum, we want—and this will be our challenge in the work that lies ahead—to make sure that its rules and procedures are right. We should be talking not the language of votes and adversarial debate but that of constructing common ground.

Rev. Ian Paisley: The last assembly in Northern Ireland proceeded in the way that the hon. Gentleman describes, with all the parties co-operating in Select Committee fashion to try to reach a consensus on various matters. Surely those rules of procedure, which were tried and have been proved to succeed, would be a good basis for the rules of the forum.

Mr. Worthington: I have to bow to the hon. Gentleman in respect of his knowledge of that time, but I agree with his words and hope that it will be possible to construct rules of procedure that lead to the construction of a consensus.

The forum, with the right rules of procedure, could diminish the most important problem—the absence of trust—and could start the decommissioning of mindsets that Mitchell sought. The rules of procedure therefore cannot be about majorities and minorities. They must be about constructing whole communities and about the construction of dialogue, understanding and consensus across the communities.

I note that the Secretary of State has to approve the rules of procedure of the forum as drawn up by the forum. In Committee, I hope that he will be willing to consider amendments that seek to make it clear that those rules must be constructed with a view to securing assent across the community. I also note that, in reality, the Secretary of State has to construct the first set of rules of procedure for the forum so that it can meet, because without such rules how can the forum come into existence?

Other hon. Members have drawn a parallel with paragraph 24 of the Command Paper, which says of the all-party talks:

"The negotiations will operate on the basis of consensus . . . The rules for establishing sufficient consensus will be agreed in advance of negotiations by the participants".

We would like that spirit to suffuse the rules of procedure for the forum itself so that it is clear that any decision taken is taken by a clear majority in both the nationalist and Unionist communities in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Trimble: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way and I apologise for intervening again. Has he considered the effect of the weighted majority provision, which necessarily means, in view of the likely result of the election, that the rules of procedure will be agreed only if assented to by nationalists, or some nationalists at any event, if they take their place at the forum and participate in it? Because it will be necessary to have the assent of some nationalists in order to achieve the 75 per cent. weighted majority, it will inevitably follow that the rules of procedure will contain the element of consensus to which he refers.

Mr. Worthington: As a first basis, one should not say that one is constructing a 75:25 per cent. majority; rather one should be seeking consensus. The great danger is that if one says that the policy is based on that 75:25 per cent., no one will bother to do the hard work that is necessary to construct a consensus. We must do just that.

The Opposition will vote for the Bill, with all its flaws and illogicalities, because it is now the only way in which all-party talks can start on 10 June. It is the only way in which there is hope of the restoration of the ceasefire. We will also vote for it because we are convinced that the people of Northern Ireland want us politicians to rise to the occasion and to take risks for peace. That is the inevitable aim behind the Bill.

I refer again to the remarks of George Mitchell, who spoke about the consensus that existed for peace. He said that members of both traditions may be less far apart on the resolution of their differences than they believe. We must open the door to all-party talks. The Bill provides the key to those talks and that is why we will support it.

9.37 pm

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Michael Ancram): I thank the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) for his support for the Bill. I also thank Her Majesty's Opposition for the bipartisan approach that they have adopted to this part of policy on Northern Ireland. We all appreciate that when we are dealing with sensitive matters of this kind, the co-operation that we have managed to achieve on that basis has not only been useful in terms of making progress, but has been valued by the community of Northern Ireland.

I start, as others have, by sending through the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) my best wishes and the best wishes of my party to the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). We wish him a speedy recovery. Everyone in the House values his contributions, and although we valued that from the hon. Member for South Down tonight, it was not quite the same, if I may say so, as that of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. I hope that the hon. Member for South Down will pass on the message that we have a great deal of respect and admiration for his hon. Friend, provided that that does not ruin his political reputation in Northern Ireland.

We have had a constructive debate and I have found a lot from which to draw optimism, particularly the fact that despite the inevitable criticism about the detail of the legislation, every party spokesman has underlined his support for the concept of all-party negotiations leading to agreement and settlement. I believe that that bodes well for the process on which we are launching ourselves at the moment.

The debate has been conducted in a serious manner and that fact has sent a message to the men of violence. It has told them that we will not allow violence to detract or distract us from the path of democracy and that no amount of bombing, shooting, punishment beatings, et cetera, will divert hon. Members of the House from pursuing what they believe to be democratically right.

We have had a detailed debate, which I suspect is a good foretaste of the Committee stage. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not deal with every detailed question that has been asked as I am certain that some of them will be asked again on Monday and Tuesday next week and I shall have a chance to deal with them then. I will pick up on two points, however, partly because they interested me in the way that they were posed.

The first was the question that was asked of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State by the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) about the reasons for going for the local government franchise rather than a parliamentary franchise. The real difference is that under the parliamentary franchise those from overseas can vote, Peers cannot vote and European citizens cannot vote. Under the local government franchise, Peers can vote—there are nine Peers who will be affected in this way and I believe that they have the right to have a say in the future of Northern Ireland—and European citizens can vote, but those from overseas cannot vote. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would wish to know that as of 29 November 1995 the number of those on the parliamentary franchise was 1,169,423 and that the number of those on the local government franchise was 1,169,353—a difference of 70. I am not sure that that will make a significant difference.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Who are they?

Mr. Ancram: We may have to ask them to carry the identity cards that the right hon. Gentleman talked about. He also referred to the Ulster clause—the clause on which I did not allow the court to intervene. There are Ulster precedents. He said that this seemed to be something totally new and anti-democratic, but I point him to the Referendum Act 1975, section 4; the Scotland Act 1978, schedule 17, paragraph 10; and the Wales Act 1978, schedule 12, paragraph 11. In each of those Acts he will find a precedent.

Mr. Taylor: I know that that specifically referred to the referendum. I wanted an assurance that the electoral court could operate on all other aspects of the election.

Mr. Ancram: The Ulster clause is carefully defined and limited, and I believe that the right hon. Gentleman will find that to be the case.

The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) raised a number of issues and I shall try to deal with them. She made the point about the importance of encouraging the participation of women in the political process in Northern Ireland, which was repeated by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Ms Church). I warmly endorse that sentiment. The political process would benefit from the greater involvement of women. We have included the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition in the list of parties and we are considering what other measures may be possible. I join the hon. Member for Redcar in encouraging the parties to make efforts to secure the greater participation of women and I am sure that they will have a significant role to play in the forum.

The hon. Lady also asked whether there was an appeal mechanism in relation to parties. We have sought to have an inclusive process and we have made considerable efforts to consult in this regard. We extended our list substantially in the light of consultation, taking into account all the representations that we received. Parties that were anxious to participate but were not on our first list had an opportunity to make their views known.

At this stage, it would be impractical to have an appeal mechanism in the Bill because there simply is no time to deal with late applications. However, it would be wrong for me to rule out absolutely any changes to the list because we have the Committee stage of the Bill to come and names could be included at that time. As I have said, there is no time to have a full appeal mechanism.

The hon. Member for Redcar and others asked about clause 7 and the power to revive the forum when it was suspended. The hon. Lady asked me to confirm that the power would not be used when negotiations had ceased or were in suspension. We have always envisaged that negotiations and the forum would run in parallel. The Secretary of State would not, therefore, propose to revive the forum while negotiations were not in progress. If the forum has ceased because, for instance, negotiations have been suspended, and then the negotiations begin again, the forum can be brought back into operation. There is power for that.

The hon. Member for Redcar and the right hon. Member for Strangford asked about the timing of the first meeting of the forum. That is for later consideration. We shall want to take views into account, and I am sure that views will be forthcoming. At this stage we do not envisage a meeting of the forum before 10 June.

The hon. Member for Redcar asked also about the exercise of discretionary powers under the Bill. The Secretary of State would hope to use those powers in a spirit of consultation and in pursuit of general acceptance where possible. On some questions, such as the identity of nominating representatives, we have consulted already in the formal paper.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) referred, first, to party descriptions. I believe that he referred to bogus parties. The consultation paper asked for the names of parties and stated that these would be set out on the ballot paper. We received a number of representations setting out how parties wanted their parties to be described, including those from the hon. Gentleman. It is not for us to decide which party is bogus. I say with some justification that Northern Ireland has some experience of new parties and new combinations of initials, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware. The people of Northern Ireland have always shown remarkable good common sense in distinguishing those parties at the ballot box.

I have heard several representations today about deposits. We shall want to receive further representations, and I suspect that they will be made in Committee.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann asked about the ground rules and wanted to know whether they were set in concrete. I know that this is a matter of concern to him. We published a consultation document on the rules on 15 March and we have undertaken detailed consultations with the principal parties on that paper since then. I believe that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that the Command Paper reflects a number of changes as a result of the consultations. It now represents, as it says,

"the best judgment of the two Governments on the most suitable and broadly acceptable ground rules for the . . . negotiations . . . on 10 June".

It is important to read the Command Paper. It makes it clear that the negotiators are the masters of their own process. There is nothing to prevent the negotiators, by agreement and consensus, agreeing to operate under different rules of procedure. That has always been so in the way in which these negotiations have proceeded. In the absence of such agreement, I believe that the ground rules should govern the negotiations starting on 10 June.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) rightly said, in his helpful contribution, that the process should be capable of continuing without Sinn Fein if Sinn Fein did not requalify to take part in the process. It is vital—it is common ground between ourselves and the Irish Government—that whatever happens in terms of Sinn Fein becoming part of the process again and the restoration of the ceasefire, if Sinn Fein is not able to become part of that process it cannot be allowed to prevent the process proceeding. Certainly the process will continue. That will happen because it is a democratic process. As I have said, democracy cannot be allowed to be subjected to the whims of violent men.

Mr. Maginnis: The Minister says that he has agreed with the Irish Government that no impediment should be allowed to be placed by Sinn Fein to prevent the talks progressing. Has he received a substantive assurance from the Irish Government that they would take specific steps to inhibit Sinn Fein's activity, should that activity escalate to the detriment of the safety of society in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Ancram: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am not the Minister responsible for security, but the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), is sitting beside me and I am sure that he has heard what the hon. Gentleman has had to say. But the corollary of saying that violence cannot be allowed to prevail in terms of the democratic process is that where there is such violence it is dealt with.

Mr. Maginnis: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way once again, but he cannot pass the burden on to his right hon. Friend on an issue that is central to the chances of success of the negotiating process. I expect a fuller answer than he has given to date.

Mr. Ancram: I can only say that I have every confidence that in the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman refers, the Irish Government would be as conscientious in the pursuit of those acts of violence as we ourselves would be. It is a part of the democratic process that violence cannot be allowed to intervene in the proper working of that process.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke referred to the electoral method as a duck-billed platypus. I am not certain that I can accept that. He went on to say that it was essentially functional. I am told that the duck-billed platypus was not necessarily the most functional of beasts. However, I think that my hon. Friend is right to say that the purpose of the rather strange type of election that we have before us, and on which we have heard many differing comments, is that it is a unique system for a unique and one-off purpose, and we believe that it will achieve that purpose.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann raised again the question of paragraphs 13 and 14 of the ground rules paper which refer to the opening session—if I can call it that—of the negotiations. He made clear again his view of the need to have discussions on the procedures in relation to the addressing of the Mitchell proposals on decommissioning so that those were clear before 10 June. We share that view and we see the need for urgent consultation on the ways of addressing those proposals and a clear idea of the procedures that will take them forward. That is something that we shall be pursuing.

The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) made a number of points. He made some fairly amusing points about the Conservative party in Northern Ireland and they were reflected later by the right hon. Member for Strangford. I can inform him that the Minister without Portfolio, my right hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), will be meeting representatives of the Conservative party Northern Ireland area council in the next few days to discuss the elections and it would be wrong of me before those discussions have taken place to make any further announcements.

I believe that we all share the horror of the hon. Member for North Antrim at some of the actions of violence that we have seen recently in Northern Ireland. They put into perspective the whole question of what is an exclusive commitment to peaceful methods. That is very much in our minds at this moment.

The hon. Member for North Antrim asked where the commitment to the six Mitchell principles would come in. I make it clear that they will come in at the beginning in the sense that nothing else could happen before the total and absolute commitment to the six Mitchell principles has taken place.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) made a number of points. In particular, he raised the question of paragraph 24 of the Command Paper and what is meant by consensus. All I can say to him is that that paragraph also indicates that it is for the parties to decide how that will operate. It is not for me to pre-empt the consultations and decisions that participants will make in relation to that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) raised a number of other important points. He spoke about the referendums in Ireland, north and south, and asked whether this was an all-Ireland referendum. The words themselves in paragraph 26 make it clear that both Governments reaffirm their intention that the referendums will take place under the jurisdiction of each Government respectively. If there are to be changes in the Irish constitution, which are likely as a result of any agreement, there would have to be a referendum in the Republic, as I understand it, in order to achieve that. With regard to our referendum being under our legislation, I can give my hon. Friend the comfort that the legislation for that referendum is included in the legislation that we are considering.

Mr. Wilshire: Can my right hon. Friend therefore once again confirm that the wording in no way suggests a watering down of the commitment to have a referendum in Northern Ireland and that a majority of the people of Northern Ireland alone must approve that as well as anything else?

Mr. Ancram: I can give my hon. Friend that commitment not only in my own terms but in terms that the Prime Minister has made clear on a number of occasions. I can give my hon. Friend that commitment completely.

I refer briefly to the speech of the hon. Member for South Down. I listened very carefully to what he had to say. I think that he is a little unfair about the forum. I hope that he will reconsider some of what he said, because he has heard hon. Members on both sides of the House talking—perhaps to his surprise—about the value of a forum, which could give a form of public ownership to the wider public in Northern Ireland and allow them, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, the chance to come forward and make their views known.

I say to the hon. Gentleman in all friendliness that he must have had a wry smile on his face when he said that we had been pursuing a Unionist-led agenda, as he will have heard the right hon. Member for Strangford, who is sitting behind him, say that the whole process had been selling out the Unionist parties. If the hon. Gentleman reconsiders, he will probably find that the balance that we have struck is reasonably good.

Mr. McGrady: The Minister suggested that the forum's sole purpose should be to garner the opinions of the people of Northern Ireland. There is nothing whatever to prevent that from being done by a negotiating team without a forum being present. Did he hear some of the remarks made tonight? The suggestion was that we have sub-committees paralleling the Northern Ireland Departments, which is an embryonic assembly in the being. That is the reality of the situation.

Mr. Ancram: I heard many comments on both sides of the House. I am interested in the way in which the forum will operate. I certainly believe that we are setting up a structure through which we can open up to a wider public—out and beyond the politicians who normally exercise it privately among themselves—much of the dialogue and understanding in Northern Ireland. I believe that the exercise of that within the forum will prove of benefit.

There are many other points that I would like to have dealt with, and I apologise to hon. Members if I did not reach them, including the detailed points made by the right hon. Member for Strangford. I am certain that he will make some of them in Committee. If he does not, I can assure him that I will get him answers to each of the points that he made.

The fullness of the debate shows the importance of the Bill and the context within which it is before the House. The implications run far wider than the details that are on the face of the Bill, which is before the House urgently because it provides the opening to what I believe is the common aim of all parties in Northern Ireland and the House, and a common desire throughout all parts of the community in Northern Ireland, to see the start, on 10 June, of genuine, comprehensive and inclusive negotiations that are based on democratic principles, with the objective of securing a broadly acceptable settlement for the future of the Province and at the same time create a forum in which dialogue and understanding in Northern Ireland can be promoted to best effect.

The Bill in itself cannot achieve those objectives, but it opens the way to the processes by which they can be achieved. It gives the people of Northern Ireland a direct contribution in providing the mandate and the key to make those processes possible. The objectives can be achieved with the good will and determination of all who will be involved in the process. The Bill does not give everyone what they wanted, but it provides the chance and the opening if all participants are prepared to face the challenges and demonstrate the good will and courage of leadership that a successful outcome so badly requires.

Sometimes history faces us with difficult challenges, and this is one of them, but how we respond dictates how we will be judged at the bar of history. I believe that if we pass the Bill, we can show that we have the courage to spit in the face of the bullet and the bomb, and proclaim the supremacy of democratic principles over the men of violence. We can say to them, as was said by the President of the United States, "Your day is over." We can show the political courage to lead by accepting that dialogue must involve some movement on all sides, however difficult that might be. We can do that by demonstrating tonight the courage to endorse this opening to negotiations and to promote the dialogue and understanding which alone can underpin the agreement that we all seek.

It is with confidence that I ask the House to support the Bill tonight.

PETITION

Anti-personnel Mines

10.11 pm

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Coventry, North–East): I beg leave to present a petition from the residents of Coventry which declares that the Lord Mayor, the City Council and the citizens of Coventry are appalled by the increasing and uncontrolled use of anti-personnel mines; the apparent indifference of manufacturers to the carnage and the rejection of responsibility by Governments.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon all governments to renounce the use, manufacture and export of anti-personnel mines; and to accept responsibility for the clearance and safe destruction of these weapons worldwide; and that the House of Commons will call upon the Government of the United Kingdom to take a lead and support all efforts at the United Nations to bring this about.

The petition has my support, and that of the Labour and Tory groups on the city council and more than 3,000 residents of Coventry.

To lie upon the Table.

Commonwealth Institute

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wells.]

10.12 pm

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring before the House the serious funding problems of the Commonwealth Institute, which was established by an Act of Parliament. A number of Commonwealth countries contributed substantially to the cost of its specially designed building in Kensington, prior to its opening back in 1962. To some extent, the institute is an international entity.

In an Adjournment debate on the Commonwealth on 31 March 1994, I told the House:

"When Her Majesty the Queen visited the Commonwealth Institute last May, she remarked:

'The institute brings the reality of the individual countries of the Commonwealth alive, and demonstrates the role the Commonwealth can play in the world and among its Members.'

Unfortunately, as the House will know, in September—owing, I believe, to an excessive Treasury squeeze on the FCO budget, and to a belief that the institute should raise more of its own money—the Government announced, without prior consultation, the decision to stop all future funding of the institute. That represented a massive blow to a popular and important institute."—[Official Report, 31 March 1994; Vol. 240, c. 1100.]

The main purpose of this debate is to bring the matter forward from there and to give the Minister of State a chance to tell us what he is proposing to do to prevent the institute from being permanently closed, which is a real possibility. I warmly welcome the Minister to the debate. I am well aware that he has on his mind some large and crucial responsibilities in other parts of the world.

The Foreign Office can point out that it has been the main source of funding for the institute since its inception, meeting more than 90 per cent. of its costs since 1963. Alack, under this Conservative Government, there has been a general underfunding of the institute. A few years ago, it was estimated that the building required a minimum of £3 million-worth of essential repairs to bring it to an acceptable standard and that desirable repairs and refurbishment would cost between £8 million and £10 million. That is hardly an example of good housekeeping for a building that has grade 2 listed status.

It was, perhaps, mainly falling visitor numbers that prompted the Government to cease grant in aid—more than £3 million for the financial year 1994-95—from March 1996. The Government then offered £2.4 million, to be spread over 1996-97 and 1998-99, conditional upon the institute and its staff attracting £5 million from other sources for its relaunch strategy by July 1995.

I pay tribute to the institute's efforts to raise money. It exceeded £1 million in the financial year 1994-95 but, unfortunately, the £5 million target was not reached and probably could not have been reached. As a result, the Secretary of State proposed that the institute's galleries—they are well known to many hon. Members and I know that Madam Speaker has visited them regularly—should be closed on or before 1 April 1996. In a letter dated 13 March to Mr. David Thompson, the chairman of the institute, the Secretary of State confirmed that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is now prepared to provide a grant of £1.5 million. Of course I welcome that but, crucially, the letter states:

"I cannot, however, give you the assurance you seek about provision of further public funds for your running costs beyond March 1997."

At present, the galleries remain closed and I regret that. Staff numbers have tumbled from 96 to 37 and are set to fall even further.

I should like to commend to the House the recent excellent report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is entitled "The Future Role of the Commonwealth". It contains a section on the institute. Paragraph 143 says:

"We are most concerned at the current situation and recognise that considerable efforts have been made by the Commonwealth Institute to cope with the financial difficulties, including imaginative plans for a major new exhibition entitled 'Wonders of the World'. However, the Institute has received no assurances about the provision of further public funds for its running costs beyond March 1997. If, by the end of 1996, the Institute has not secured private finance sufficient to give it a reasonable prospect of being self-financed from April 1997, there must be a real prospect of permanent closure. This must be avoided."

Indeed so. That is the key aim of my speech tonight.

As the Minister will know, permanent closure of the institute would require primary legislation. The Committee sensibly pointed out that the House should have a proper debate on the subject of permanent closure if that is seriously being contemplated by the Government. The Minister's thoughts on that recommendation would be appreciated.

The Minister will know that the Commonwealth Trust works closely with the institute, and the Committee was told by witnesses from the trust that the role of the institute is "crucial to us in terms of educating young people in Britain".

The trust leaves to the institute the task of promoting knowledge of the Commonwealth in schools.

During my Adjournment debate on 31 March, I complained—I think justifiably—that the Government had failed to stir the imagination of the younger generation about the Commonwealth. The institute is one obvious way to approach that task. We spend only a few hundred thousand pounds each year educating people about the Commonwealth, whereas the European Union can spend very large sums on educating people about the EU.

I cannot justify the harsh approach adopted by the Government to the institute in recent years. I suspect that part of the rationale behind that approach has been a feeling in the Foreign Office that the Commonwealth itself should give greater financial support. I think that that is right. Apparently only a tiny proportion of the institute's budget comes from other Commonwealth countries. Singapore, Canada and Australia all have a higher gross national product per capita than does the United Kingdom; they could, and should, do more.

I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Stephen Cox, the outstanding director general, and to his shrinking staff for their sterling efforts to keep the institute's doors open. They must be supported by this House. Indeed, I believe that there is considerable support for them in all quarters.

I believe and have said before that the Foreign Office budget is far too small. We need to expand our diplomatic posts in eastern Europe. As happened about a decade ago, we are back to underfunding the BBC World Service, and the British Council is in danger of having to close a number of offices. Our aid programme is diminishing as well. Some of us find that pretty depressing and not in the national interest.

The underpinning is, I accept, partly to blame for the crisis facing the institute. The future of this important institute must be seen against the background of the growing importance of the Commonwealth. The Foreign Affairs Committee's report has much to say on the subject. As early as paragraph 4, it remarks on how the Commonwealth's membership has changed beyond recognition in terms of economic performance:

"While it is still the case that some members of the Commonwealth are amongst the poorest in the world and rightly deserve the help and support of the richer developed world, the organisation now also contains some of the world's fastest growing economies, and even some of the richest. Thus, Singapore's income per head is a fifth higher than that of the United Kingdom and Malaysia is catching up fast. India's overall poverty conceals pockets of enormous dynamism and prosperity, whilst both Australia and New Zealand are now clear beneficiaries of the Asia-Pacific growth momentum. Hopes are also high for the resumption of significant growth in southern Africa."

No wonder that the Committee feels that the implications for our country of some of the world's fastest-growing markets being within the Commonwealth ranks deserve urgent re-examination.

Paragraph 9 of the report states:

"If the centre of gravity of the world economy is shifting in Asia's direction, then the Western countries best positioned to take advantage of this new scene will be those that have taken the trouble to maintain strong links of every kind with this emerging world. The old Commonwealth ties could therefore become, for the United Kingdom, the new Commonwealth opportunities."

One wonders if the Foreign Office is running ahead of or behind that kind of new thinking.

It is not too late for the Foreign Office to take another look at the importance of that well-known and well-loved institute and to make sure that it has the public funds that it needs not only to survive, but to prosper and help meet the needs of our rapidly changing Commonwealth.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): The Government welcome the debate. The Commonwealth Institute has many supporters, and I congratulate one of its most faithful supporters—my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend). He is an honourable Friend indeed, and his knowledge of, and interest in, foreign affairs the world over is second to none in the House. The Foreign Affairs Committee has taken a close interest in the Commonwealth Institute's well-being, and included some pertinent observations in its welcome report, "The Future Role of the Commonwealth", which was tabled before Easter.

My noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will visit the institute next week to discuss with Asian high commissioners in London how their galleries can best be developed. The permanent under-secretary of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office will be able to answer questions about the institute when he appears before the Foreign Affairs Committee next month to discuss the FCO's departmental report. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary has taken a close personal interest in the institute since he assumed office. He discussed future financing by the FCO for the institute with its chairman, Mr. David Thompson, in October and decided in March to make available £1.5 million this financial year, to enable the institute to maintain its core education, library and conference operations.

The Government's support for the Commonwealth Institute is part of a wider support for Commonwealth links worldwide, but I shall not rehearse them all now. Our decision to invite the Commonwealth Heads of Government to meet in the United Kingdom next year shows our confidence in the Commonwealth's continuing vitality and usefulness. Differences of view between Commonwealth countries over Rhodesia and South Africa have been replaced by a shared adherence to the democratic and liberal values set out in the Harare declaration and by the work that the Commonwealth can do to fulfil them. That common purpose was evident at the last Heads of Government meeting in Auckland last November.

Next Tuesday, my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary will attend at the Commonwealth headquarters at Marlborough house, as one of eight Foreign Ministers who are members of the Commonwealth ministerial action group, which was established in Auckland to follow up the Harare declaration. They will see how they can best influence the Nigerian and Gambian military Governments to return to civilian democratic rule. Recent elections in Sierra Leone received significant help from the Commonwealth and we hope that the Commonwealth can help the Gambia to organise free and fair elections later this year.

I do not deny that the Commonwealth Institute and, specifically, providing adequate funds for it, poses the Government a problem. The essence of the problem is simple: funds at a level required to make the institute vibrant, to increase visitor numbers, to bring its galleries and exhibitions up to a modern standard and to put the building, which has special features, in a good state of maintenance cannot be financed out of the FCO's budget alone without unacceptable damage to other priorities. We already contribute significantly across the board to Commonwealth activities: to Commonwealth scholarships, the Commonwealth Secretariat, the Commonwealth Foundation and the Commonwealth Fund for Technical Co-operation.

The Commonwealth Institute does worthy work. I shall talk later about its interesting history, but its overall role is somewhat apart from the FCO's core activities. That means that we have to be imaginative in finding ways of securing the comparatively large sums needed to make it thrive.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: I may be forecasting what my right hon. Friend is about to say, but it is important that this should come out. What efforts are the Government making to get a greater contribution from Commonwealth members?

Mr. Hanley: My hon. Friend, as ever, is right. I shall refer to that a little later.

In 1993, the Commonwealth Institute celebrated its 100th anniversary. We are dealing not with a new body but with one which, at a number of points in the last century, has changed its focus to remain up to date and useful. The Imperial Institute, to which the Commonwealth Institute is the legal successor, began life in the 1890s as an integral part of Imperial college, as one of those fine institutions established in Kensington, using funds from the Great Exhibition and public subscription. Indeed, the Imperial Institute's distinctive tower can be seen standing out among the newer buildings of Imperial college, behind the Albert hall. Its original purpose was as a scientific research institute that made its findings available for all Britain's colonies and dominions.

Those with an interest in the history of the British empire will not be surprised to know that the hand of Joseph Chamberlain, the energetic colonial secretary at the time, was active in creating the institute. By the 1920s, in the trend that led to the Statute of Westminster in 1931, the willingness of the dominions and some colonies to fund a central research organisation in London came under question. Canada, Australia, South Africa and others understandably established their own scientific research institutes, specialising in products of interest to them.

In 1925 the Imperial Institute passed to the care of the Board of Trade, as a body concerned with furthering economic links in the empire. Indeed, at that time it was touch and go whether the institute would survive. However, it developed a new role, publicising the empire and particularly the economic benefits for its constituent parts, in line with the major imperial exhibitions held in the 1920s and 1930s. The institute played its part, with film shows and other activities, in spreading knowledge of the empire. After the second world war, that new educational and publicising role was recognised, when responsibility passed from the Board of Trade to the Department of Education.

In the 1950s the Department of Education launched an ambitious programme to increase the number of science graduates in the United Kingdom. The space occupied by the institute was needed to expand Imperial college. The Department of Education decided to provide the institute with a new home on Kensington high street, in a new building designed as a symbol of Britain's support for the Commonwealth and opened in 1962. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office took over responsibility in the late 1960s, in recognition of the role that the new Commonwealth was playing in British political life.

To begin with, everything went swimmingly. Commonwealth Governments contributed generously not only to the building, but to their exhibition galleries. The building was new. The Commonwealth was renewing itself. New educational techniques were exciting for children coming on visits. By the 1980s, the picture was somewhat different. Precious little money was forthcoming from other Commonwealth Governments to help run the institute. Indeed, in recent years the UK Government's contribution has been some 99 per cent. Some countries provided money to renew their exhibitions, but far from all did so. Many of the exhibitions have begun to look rather tired. As I am sure my hon. Friend knows, there is a splendid New Zealand mechanical cow, which illustrates that country's dairy industry. It has been munching away to the delight of schoolchildren since the 1960s, with all the transparency of Damien Hirst, but 25 years earlier. Perhaps for some, the cow has the same horror, but for most it has been supremely educational.

The Department for Education and Employment has increasingly devolved money to schools to decide on their own purchasing. Institute curriculum materials and education programmes are highly valued, but other Government Departments do not contribute to running costs.

Then there is the building itself. Those with the appropriate powers decreed that its special architectural merits—I understand it was a forerunner for the Sydney opera house—made it of outstanding architectural importance. It was listed as a grade 2 starred building and, in practice, that means that it can be altered in any way only with the greatest difficulty. Whatever views are held on the design, the requirement for money to maintain the roof—a novel and spectacular design, certainly in the 1960s—and other features in the building, has come back year after year to haunt us.

Against that background, the Government decided in the mid-1980s to find a way to inject new money into the institute. Initially, an ambitious plan to develop the site commercially was investigated. It looked promising, but the decline in London property values in the late 1980s put paid to it. In 1992, we asked Lord Armstrong, now the vice-chairman of the institute, to report on how the institute's future could best be secured. Essentially, he concluded that the worst option would be to allow the institute to wither on the vine. Visitor numbers have been declining. The building was deteriorating. The exhibition galleries were becoming outmoded. Running costs were high in relation to the work that the institute did. After considering Lord Armstrong's report, the Government decided that the institute should be given two years to find commercial private sponsorship. If that was not forthcoming, the Government concluded, reluctantly, that their own funding for the institute should cease and the building be put to another use.

Since September 1993, the institute has engaged with great energy in increasing its revenue. Staff numbers have been reduced, as my hon. Friend mentioned, by 66 per cent., largely because of the closure of the exhibitions. The conference centre and other activities have increased their earnings by 77 per cent. to nearly £1 million a year. I congratulate Stephen Cox and the staff on a splendid achievement. They have put a huge effort into identifying commercial finance. To our great regret, their efforts have not yet proved successful. The Government agreed to extend by six months, from July to December last year, the period for fund raising, but to no immediate avail. In those circumstances, Government funding was set to end in April this year—this month—and the institute was to close. Instead of doing so, the Government have decided to provide the institute with at least one further year to find out whether private sponsorship can be found.

We proposed that savings should be made immediately by closing the exhibition galleries temporarily. They were in any case due to close for refurbishment. The Government will provide a grant for the coming year sufficient to keep the institute's key operations—the education operation, the library and the conference centre—going. Meanwhile, the search for sponsorship and the programme for redeveloping the galleries can continue.

The Government have also provided more than £500,000, as I mentioned earlier, to help improve the building. Ministers have worked with the institute's governors to identify companies that might wish to become partners. We are examining the scope for using the private finance initiative, and we shall have intensive discussions with the institute over the next two months to find whether there are other ways in which finance can be raised.

I hope that other Commonwealth countries will produce income and that they understand the historical nature of this building in London, but we must be realistic. I hope that my hon. Friend will lend his considerable efforts and ask his contacts to consider such action.

It would be tragic if the institute had to fold. We do not want it to close, but it would not be responsible for the Government to continue drip-feeding it with grants simply to enable it to tick over and go into slow decline. We consider it better to face the problem squarely and recognise that fresh thinking and a fresh injection of money is needed. We are disappointed that, so far, new money has not been found, but we are not giving up. The institute has a valuable role to play, but it must adapt to modern conditions. It draws on immense good will throughout the country and in the Commonwealth. The challenge is to tap that good will to produce finance.

I hope that children will be attracted to the institute and that school parties will not only receive the educational benefits of the London Dungeon and Madame Tussaud's. I hope that they will recognise the history that is demonstrated by the establishment of the Commonwealth Institute. It is a unique organisation that spans the world: 53 countries which all, when they meet, speak one language and all attempt to achieve good government and the friendship that spans the races. As the institute's governors work at that task, they have the Government's firm support. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for having given us the opportunity to dwell on an important and lasting institution.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 19 April 1996

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Bill

Not amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Clause 2

INCITEMENT TO COMMIT CERTAIN SEXUAL ACTS OUTSIDE THE UNITED KINGDOM

9.34 am

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'( ) Any act of incitement by means of a message (however communicated) is to be treated as done in England and Wales if the message is sent or received in England and Wales'.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also No. 2, in clause 6, page 4, line 26, at end insert—

'( ) Any act of incitement by means of a message (however communicated) is to be treated as done in Scotland if the message is sent or received in Scotland'.

Mr. Marshall: The purpose of the amendments is to extend for the purposes of the Bill the scope of incitement, to ensure that any incitement by means of a telephone call, fax, Internet message or any other modern form of communication is deemed to take place in England, Wales or, as the case may be, in the glorious part of the country called Scotland, if the message is received in England, Wales or Scotland. Thus, if someone is sent a fax in England inciting him to commit an offence, the originator of the fax has committed an offence because the incitement to indulge in such a holiday was felt here.

An amendment similar in effect was tabled by the Opposition spokesman in Committee. I am sure that the hon. Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) and for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) will both confirm that we had a productive Committee stage. We had a listening Committee. My right hon. Friend the Minister and I listened to the concerns that various right hon. and hon. Members expressed.

The amendment was resisted on the grounds that it was technically deficient. I sympathise with the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth for the fact that the amendment was deficient. None of us is a trained parliamentary draftsman—indeed, sometimes even they produce technically deficient Bills and amendments. So they cannot be surprised when mere Members of Parliament have the same problem.

My right hon. Friend the Minister accepted that there was merit in the principle of the amendment moved in Committee, but he thought that the position would probably be covered by the existing common law offence of incitement. It is always important when we obtain an opinion from a Minister which is based on a legal opinion that we have a belt-and-braces approach. We know only too well that lawyers make their money out of giving opinions.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The hon. Gentleman said that the amendment referred to faxes in England, Wales and Scotland. In this world of communications, should he not also have included faxes in Northern Ireland, especially when we bear it in mind that travel agents and others operate in all the countries?

Mr. Marshall: The hon. Gentleman has anticipated a later paragraph in my speech. Under clause 4, this amendment would also apply to Northern Ireland. We know that evil knows no national boundaries, and that there are some people in Northern Ireland who are not so good as they might be.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would expand on a couple of points. It seems to me that this new amendment of his introduces the principle of extra-territoriality—something which many of us would have liked to see in the Bill on a much wider front.

If I understand it correctly, the amendment will mean that a British citizen, say in Bangkok, who sends a telegram or fax that might be deemed incitement will be guilty of an offence in Britain, and, should he return, could be prosecuted even though at the time of the offence he was located abroad. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend could confirm that the important principle of extra-territoriality has now been accepted.

Mr. Marshall: As my hon. Friend knows, the principle of extra-territoriality has always been accepted for certain aspects of British law. We both voted for the War Crimes Act 1991, which involved that principle. He is right: if someone in Bangkok sends out faxes or Internet messages to individuals in the United Kingdom saying, "Come here, there are 12-year-olds to be bought for £5," that would be an offence under the Bill.

That is rightly so, because it is hard to conceive of the depths of depravity to which normally civilised people will sink. The House will have been appalled to read that, in Australia, a former Australian ambassador is being accused of paedophile activity while he was on official duty.

Mr. Batiste: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend has said, and I may want to speak on it at some length later, but when he mentioned the Internet, he touched on another aspect of considerable significance.

The difficulty posed by the Internet is that a message put up by a British subject in Bangkok is not necessarily physically delivered to the United Kingdom, either in hard copy or electronically. It is the person in Britain who plugs into the message board who receives it. Clearly, that person might be guilty of an offence, but would the man in Bangkok, if he had done no more than put a message on the Internet, be liable for incitement if he returns to the United Kingdom?

Mr. Marshall: Amendment No. 2 states:

"Any act of incitement by means of a message (however communicated) is to be treated as done in Scotland if the message is sent or received in Scotland."

Similarly, amendment No. 1 refers to

"any act of incitement by means of a message (however communicated)".

Obviously that covers the Internet, faxes, letters or any method by which someone is incited to go on such holidays.

Someone in a Bangkok office who decides to put an offensive message on the Internet encouraging people to go on holidays in Bangkok, Peru or another underdeveloped country for these disgusting activities, will be covered by the Bill, guilty of an offence and liable to prosecution if they return to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Did we not decide in Committee that the difficulty of proving incitement and conspiracy is such that it was necessary to ensure that the simple act of the making information available, or of transmitting it to the United Kingdom, should be covered by the Bill? If it were not, the Bill's impact would be minimal, if not negligible. I welcome the amendments as a major improvement that will go a great way to meeting the aspirations that we shared in Committee. Of course, the Bill is still limited to incitement and conspiracy.

Mr. Marshall: In advertising, it is argued that some advertisements are persuasive and some informative, but the latter are also designed to be persuasive. The Bill, as now worded, means that, if people send messages that girls or boys can be had for £5 in a certain hotel in Bangkok, it is an incitement. It is not a purely factual message but an incitement to go there to engage in these disgusting activities. We are at one on that.

On the wider question of extending the Bill, the Government have set up an inquiry into the principle of extra-territoriality, about which I am sure my right hon. Friend the Minister will want to talk. Without going too deeply into the matter, I fear that, if we were to apply the principle of extra-territoriality to crimes committed in, say, Bangkok, we might be indulging in a gesture.

Mr. Michael rose—

9.45 am

Mr. Marshall: Do let me finish. I am being pretty generous in giving way. The hon. Gentleman should at least allow me to finish my argument before he asks me to give way again.

We frequently hear about the experience of Sweden, but let us consider what happened. The boy who gave evidence to the Swedish court—

Mr. Michael: Did we not agree in Committee that many hon. Members aspired to go further than the Bill does? As the hon. Gentleman said, the Government are undertaking an important inquiry. We agreed that we should speed the Bill, in as effective a form as possible, through the House, so that at least a step forward was taken. I say that because, with respect, it is not necessary to go into the arguments about widening the Bill, because we all agree that this is a first step. Let us take it and not delay and perhaps risk the Bill.

Mr. Marshall: When I am incited by an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman not to speak, it is almost as good as when my Whips tell me to speak. I obey unhesitatingly on both occasions.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I hesitate to intervene in the debate because I was not a member of the Committee. I have had the advantage of reading the report of the Committee, and I agree with the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) that it was constructive; it makes good reading.

I entirely support the principle behind my hon. Friend's Bill, but I am worried that, with amendments Nos. 1 and 2, we may be seeking to get to the best and so not achieving the good—that the best is the enemy of the good is an old cliché. Is my hon. Friend sure that they will prevent or inhibit potential inciters abroad from listing names and addresses on a bulletin board that can be received in this country?

The bulletin board could appear wholly innocent. It would simply list No. 4, Jones street, Bangkok or whatever. That will mean more to a knowledgeable receiver than to an ordinary receiver of that information. Clause 1(3), the double criminality clause, states:

"The second condition is that that act or other event constitutes an offence under the law in force in that country or territory."

Is he sure that his well-intentioned amendments will allow what I loosely call the double actionability rule to bite on the clause and ensure that the inciter in Bangkok would face arrest if he came to this country?

Mr. Marshall rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues his speech, I must warn against excessively long interventions. If they are that long, they should be the subject of a separate speech.

Mr. Marshall: Madam Deputy Speaker, I thank you for that protection. I have always thought that in politics, a long question is a great bonus, because the audience will have forgotten the question by the time the person asking it has finished. I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friend confesses that he has forgotten any part of his question.

Mr. Garnier: I have not forgotten my question.

Mr. Marshall: I think that part of the House probably has. My answer is that, if I did not think the amendment would have the effect that I have outlined, I would not have tabled it; nor would the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) have made his comments in Committee if he had not thought that it was a real problem.

Many of us find the revolution in information technology difficult to understand, as it happened after we reached the age of 21—at least, it did for me. I do not necessarily know as much about it as some of my younger colleagues, but if someone in Bangkok seeks by means of what one would describe as informative advertising to encourage individuals to go there and indulge in those awful, perverted and pernicious acts, I believe that he would be caught under these amendments.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I thank my long-suffering hon. Friend for giving way, but it is an important point—

Mr. Garnier: He was in the middle of an answer to my question.

Mr. Marshall: I had finished with my hon. and learned Friend.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We cannot have one intervention on another. I call the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland).

Lady Olga Maitland: Thank you very much, Madam Deputy Speaker. Obviously, I will bear those remarks in mind.

We were talking about technology and how it can be a vehicle for transmitting such information. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) mentioned telephone calls. Is he suggesting that, if it is believed that they are being used as a mechanism for transmitting such material, they should be intercepted or, indeed, bugged?

Mr. Marshall: With her customary charm, my hon. Friend has managed to enter into yet another field of activity. I am sure that one could have a long and learned discussion about whether telephone calls should be tapped. No doubt our right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office can tell us the conditions under which telephone calls should be tapped. My view is that there are certain privacies in this world, and that, if one cannot make a telephone call without having it tapped—unless there are very good reasons for it being tapped—we would be denying individuals one of their human rights.

Mr. Michael: Is not the simple fact that nothing in the law is changed in relation to the interception of messages by anything in the Bill, including the amendments, so that issue is irrelevant to today's debate?

Mr. Marshall: I have learnt that, whether interjections are relevant or irrelevant, colleagues are never stopped from making them.

I hope that I have dealt with the last intervention, and I ask the Minister to talk about the inquiry into extra-terratoriality, which is obviously dealt with tangentially by the amendment. The principle is one that he announced that the Government were again investigating.

He has said that the investigation should be completed before the summer recess, and it would be helpful to the House, in view of the impact of the amendment, if my right hon. Friend referred to that matter at some stage, especially in view of what has happened in Australia in the past few days.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) for tabling these amendments, which clarify, for the purposes of the Bill, the scope of the common law of incitement.

Let me say at the outset that there is no question but that the sexual exploitation and abuse of children is an evil act, and that children should be provided with the highest level of protection against such abuse. I am sure that the whole House would agree that everything possible should be done to prevent and deter the perverts who indulge such behaviour.

These two amendments, small though they may look on paper and insignificant and technical though they may appear, are central to the thrust of this Bill. The issues covered by the amendments were raised in Committee by hon Members from both sides of the House. My view was that the common law of incitement was adequate to cover the situations envisaged by the amendments. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South shares that view.

This is an area, however, where certainty is a valuable commodity—a point I recall the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) making in Committee. I am therefore glad that my hon. Friend has moved these amendments, and I can reassure him and the House that the Government support them.

It may be helpful to the House to reflect upon the principle that lies behind the amendments and how increasingly important it is in today's world. Incitement is an act of urging or encouraging someone to do something. Today, I shall incite hon Members to support this Bill. By doing so, I am not committing a criminal offence, because the act that I am inciting hon. Members to do is perfectly lawful.

However, if I urged hon. Members to run outside and rob a bank, I would be guilty of a criminal offence—at least, I would if parliamentary privilege did not apply—as I would be encouraging them to do something unlawful. That, simply, is the common law offence of incitement.

In that case, there is no doubt as to the jurisdiction of the courts. I, the inciter, and hon. Members, as—if I may use the word—incitees, are here present. But that new—indeed, not so new—technology, which has brought so much benefit to so many people's lives, can also bring disbenefits and confusion in this area of law.

If I went on holiday to France and wrote a letter to someone in this country, urging him or her to commit a criminal offence here, am I committing an offence in this country? I believe that there is case law that suggests that I am, and that, if I were then foolish enough to return to this country, I could be arrested and charged for incitement.

The postal service—marvellous though it is—is not an example of the most modern technology. Vocal communication systems—mobile phones, for example—enable us to speak to anyone in the world, from anywhere in the world. Would encouragement to commit an offence by phone message be incitement at common law? Case law may be less certain there.

The Internet, which has been mentioned this morning, is a subject about which we have heard much recently, and I am sure that hon. Members will hear a lot more about it in the future. If I understand it correctly, the Internet is simply a linking together of individual computers around the world. I have no doubt that it can be described more fully and more technically in several volumes of books, each weighty enough to be described as an encyclopedia, but put simply, that is all the Internet is.

Nevertheless, it is a powerful thing and it is going to get a lot more powerful. Messages can be sent around the world in seconds—not just text, but images and even moving images, voice, sound and music. The police have shown me some, and I have heard it said that the only barrier to what could be carried on the Internet in future is one's own imagination. That is as maybe, but such a powerful tool, which offers wonderful opportunities for enhancing communication around the world, unfortunately lends itself to mischief making, and is one of the prime tools being grabbed by paedophiles and others in that filthy business.

Incitement by Internet is now a possibility, and that incitement can take place anywhere in the world instantaneously. The question is, can our common law cope? I should like to think that the common law, which has served this country well for centuries, is robust enough to deal with any challenge that the late 20th century can throw at it. As an aside, Scots law was always able to adapt rapidly to modern technology and trends, from the 1700s and 1800s on, but that is not relevant to this debate.

We must not forget that in this Bill we are dealing with the safety and security of innocent children.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North) rose—

Mr. Maclean: I should not have tempted my hon. Friend. May I finish this point before I give way?

Any society must, as its first priority, see to it that its children are protected and cared for by the law of the land.

Mr. Jenkin: My right hon. Friend's previous comment raises a question that I should, perhaps, not be asking. Surely the Bill applies in Scotland. Is my right hon. Friend suggesting that some of the provisions might be applied very differently there?

Mr. Maclean: No, I was not suggesting that they would be applied differently in Scotland. I was merely suggesting that the Scottish legal system, which is based on Roman-Dutch law, whereby judges could rule that something was contra bonos mores and interpret the law more flexibly than case law in England, could be said—this is merely an academic argument of the type that might take place in some of the Scottish universities when Scots law and its future in Britain or, indeed, Europe are debated—to enable it to deal more flexibly with new customs, technology or crimes that Parliament has not yet decided to outlaw. Scottish courts, for example, took a slightly different view of the practice of wheel clamping than did the English courts.

There is no question of interpreting the law differently. It is merely that, by habit, custom and coming from different theological bases, Scots law and English law have developed different flexibilities.

We do not want there to be any doubt on this subject. The law being passed today—which hopefully will receive a Third Reading today—will apply equally in both countries of the Union, as it will, of course, in Wales and Northern Ireland through clause 4,

Mr. Batiste: For many years, I have been very interested in the issue of extra-territoriality and in the technological aspects of the internet. My right hon. Friend has just made some very positive statements about the Internet and about how messages on it would be covered by this legislation. There are, however, some very significant differences, which I shall try to draw out in a little more detail shortly in a speech.

There is a difference between sending out a message to an intended recipient in the United Kingdom and putting a message on to a bulletin board on the Internet somewhere in the world, which would then be examined and scanned by people in the UK. I am not at all sure that the drafting of this amendment will necessarily catch that second type of incitement over the Internet.

10 am

Mr. Maclean: I believe it does, because the amendment states:

"if the message is sent or received".

If the wording was

"if the message is sent with the intention that it may only be received in England by a willing recipient", it would have a severe limitation, and would not be relevant to the Internet. The fact that someone is "surfing the net" or "scanning"—or whatever the jargon is—and receives the message is sufficient to trigger this clause. There would be no problem in relation to the legal position.

There will, of course, still be a practical problem if that person in Bangkok who was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) never leaves Bangkok or returns to Britain, because we will physically not be able get our hands on him. Nevertheless, the crime will have been committed.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North–East): I should like to continue with the point about intent in relation to sending a message and whether it has been received. As a non-lawyer, my concern is whether someone would be able to drive a coach and horses through the clause by arguing that, by sending the message to a bulletin board, they were not intending necessarily that it should be received by someone in England. Would not a clever lawyer—there are plenty of clever lawyers in this place, as there are elsewhere—be able to use that as a defence?

Mr. Maclean: I would say no, in no circumstances could it be used as a defence. We know what bulletin boards are, and we will get more details about how the Internet works. Bulletin boards are not a dead end in themselves, but a means of ensuring that messages are kept anonymous so that it is difficult to discover who sent the message. The sender knows that the message will then be transmitted to another web of computers and received by other people.

It would not be a defence for someone to say, "I invented a message and put it on the bulletin board, but of course I never expected anyone to read it." That defence would be disingenuous, and I do not think that it would hold water with any judge, magistrate or jury.

Mr. Jenkin: What would happen if the message in question is in a foreign language? Could it be argued that, even though the message is available in the UK and of course available for translation, because the message is in French or Spanish, for example, it is not intended to be read in this country? Could that be used as a defence?

Mr. Maclean: I do not think that that would hold water as a defence, either. In many of those examples, it would be a matter of proof and the facts of the case. According to the amendments' wording, the message would still have been received in the United Kingdom, and it would still be an offence however the message was communicated—in whatever language it was communicated. Many people in this country speak Spanish, and somewhere in this country every language is spoken by someone. Despite the language, it would still be an offence.

The amendment is certainly worded in such a manner that it would catch those messages. It would then be a matter for the police and the prosecuting authorities to decide in each case whether they had sufficient evidence to justify a prosecution, and of course whether they physically have the fellow who did it—and I say "fellow" advisedly.

I was saying before I ventured into my biased Scots law aside that there should be certainty. These amendments must provide such certainty. Any act of incitement by means of a message, however communicated, shall be deemed to take place in England and Wales if its effect is felt and received there. The second amendment deals with exactly the same situation in Scotland.

Thus, no one can claim that they are outside the jurisdiction of the Bill because they sent the message by Internet from Hong Kong, used a mobile phone in Venezuela or posted a letter in Egypt. If the message was received in this country or sent from here, the news is—by virtue of these amendments—they are caught.

That is the message that I should like to go out from the House today when the Bill is reported—that we are after those people in future. The message should be not only that we can now catch their physical acts against children, but that—when this Bill goes through its stages today, through the other place and then receives Royal Assent—the people hiding on the Internet or sending their filthy messages by that means of communication will be caught by this Parliament and by this Bill.

Mr. Garnier: My right hon. Friend may have uttered a slip of the tongue. He used the expression "sent or received"—which is in the amendment—but he also used the expression "the effect of", which is not quite the same as "sent or received". I wonder—bearing in mind the case of Pepper v. Hart, which allows the courts to look at what Ministers say in Committee—whether he could be a little clearer about the use of the expression "the effect of", because we are talking incitement.

Mr. Maclean: I thought that it was quite clear that the act shall be deemed to have taken place in England or Wales if the message put on the Internet in any other part of the world is felt here—if it is received here, seen here and available to be read by people here—and that it is an offence and is caught by this section. The effect of putting that message on the Internet is felt here, so the law is triggered. I hope that that is clear.

The person does not necessarily have to go and commit an act of indecency with a child. The person does not have to carry it into effect. Because the incitement has been put on the Internet—perhaps to come to Bangkok to do things with children—does not mean that the person who receives the message has to go to Bangkok and physically carry out an act before the crime is committed. The person who put the message on the Internet similarly does not have to ensure that someone carries out an act before he is guilty of an offence. The fact that the message has been put on the board and has been received here is the offence, not whether any physical act is then perpetrated.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, because I think that he is helping to clarify the intention of the Bill, as I understand it. May I try my own words to clarify the position? The act of the putting information on an electronic bulletin board is the first step of a piece of communication that would be caught under these amendments. That is how I interpret the words in the amendments, and I believe that that is what the Minister intends, is it not?

Mr. Maclean: As I understand it, yes; I think that we are in agreement on that—but, of course, it has to be received here for the offence to be triggered.

Lady Olga Maitland: On the point about "received", what would happen if the recipient received material that was totally unsolicited? The offence, therefore, must have been perpetrated by the sender. If the sender is overseas, it is clearly not an offence, but the person receiving unsolicited material in this country could be deemed to be committing an offence. I am sure that that is not what my right hon. Friend intended.

Mr. Maclean: No. The criminal is the inciter, the person who puts the information on the Internet, or communicates the message by fax or whatever. That person is inciting others to go to countries to do certain things with children. The innocent person who is browsing the Internet and stumbles across that information does not commit any offence. If a person lifts paedophile material or indecent photographs of children from the Internet, or from any other source, and then uses them or trades them, that person is guilty of existing offences.

A person may well read such messages in a newspaper where such advertisements, which are carefully worded, escape existing law. That will not happen in the future. I have been sent some of those sex tour advertisements by hon. Members. Of course the innocent person who reads such advertisements is not guilty of an offence, but the person who plants them with intent is guilty of an offence.

Reference has been made to the fact that Northern Ireland is omitted from the text of the amendment. I hasten to explain that that is not an error. Clause 4 applies the provisions of clause 2 to Northern Ireland. The amendment to clause 2, which refers to England and Wales, encompasses Northern Ireland by virtue of the provisions of clause 4. I do not want any hon. Member from Northern Ireland, or indeed any other hon. Member, to believe that that part of the United Kingdom has been given any less prominence than any other part.

Hon. Members may recall the Bolin case in Sweden. Last year, the Swedes successfully prosecuted one of their own nationals, Bengt Bolin, for sexual offences committed against a boy in Thailand. It was an interesting case, because many people wrote to me and urged me—incited me, perhaps—to change the law to allow our courts extra-territorial jurisdiction over child sex offences. They believed that that successful prosecution showed that we could do the same.

I looked at the case carefully, took advice from appropriate professionals, and came to the conclusion that, on the facts of the case as presented to the court in Sweden, we could not have secured a conviction under English law. I do not want any hon. Member to get me wrong—I am not saying that the conviction in Sweden was unsafe, unfair or in any way tainted. Under their rules of evidence, they secured a conviction, and one pervert had to pay his dues to society by serving a term of imprisonment and paying compensation to his victim. I am sure that we are all pleased about that.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): It is interesting to hear the Minister's comments. Did he get in touch with the Swedish Government about the matter?

Mr. Maclean: I did not get in touch, but my Department has a huge staff to do that sort of thing. We received transcripts of the case, which were in Swedish, not surprisingly, and we had them translated. We analysed them in great depth and took expert legal advice. We could not reach a conclusion without reading those transcripts. But good luck to the Swedes, because, under their perfectly legitimate and sensible law, they managed to get a conviction, but under English rules of evidence we would not have managed to secure one.

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): I hope that you will allow me, Madam Deputy Speaker, to refer briefly to the Bolin case, which my right hon. Friend has raised. I believe that he is being disingenuous by suggesting that that case would have failed in a British court. The English prosecution service would not have presented the case in the same way. The essence of the case would have been presented to a British court, which uses the jury system, in a different way from how it was presented to a Swedish court, where a judge sits with other adjudicators.

An eminent Swedish juryman has written to the Coalition on Child Prostitution and Tourism:

> "From a purely practical viewpoint, I would dare to venture that the English jury system might tend to favour the prosecution—I reckon that a 60-year-old retired civil servant proven to be found in a bedroom at night with a twelve year old Thai boy regularly engaged in prostitution might be off to a bad start with twelve English jurors!"

I suspect that that is the case. My right hon. Friend is slightly misjudging the relevance of the Bolin case by saying that, if it had been presented here as it had been presented in Sweden, it would not have stood up. The prosecution would have approached it in a different way in the British courts, and a conviction would have been secured.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend is right to say that, if the evidence was ever put before a jury, one would hope that an English jury would convict. He is also right to say that an English prosecutor would have to present the facts in a radically different way if he was to secure any conviction or ensure that any part of the case was heard.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Mr. Maclean: I shall give way in a moment.

10.15 am

If one studies the evidence given by the boy, one will find that he alleged that he settled on the final version of his story after, as he claims, he was threatened by a police officer in his own country, who was waving a gun at him. We do not quite allow that under the rules of evidence in this country, but that at least is what he said.

The boy was looked after and prepared for his court hearing by a non-governmental organisation. Can one imagine what would happen in our courts when the defence lawyer stood up and said that the boy had been prepared for his court hearing? The defence would certainly claim that the boy had been prepared and made to recite his evidence backwards, whether that was true or not. We do not allow that in an English court. Can one imagine what would happen if the boy gave evidence in an English court under cross-examination? Even the most newly qualified lawyer would tear his evidence apart.

One of the main reasons that the Swedes got a conviction and preferred the boy's version of events to that of the defendant was that the defendant had admitted assaulting the boy to an off-duty Swedish police officer who was posing as a fellow child molester. That conversation was clandestinely recorded by a Danish television crew. I cannot imagine the circumstances in which we could manage to get such evidence accepted in an English court.

Mr. Michael: I fear that the Minister is allowing himself to go down avenues that are not necessary to our debate. Frankly, the Swedish case is irrelevant, and the Minister has said why. It took place under different rules of evidence, and under a different legal system. Surely we are interested to hear from the right hon. Gentleman about how his inquiries and conclusions may make it easier for the law of England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland to deal with the actions of our citizens abroad. The Minister undertook that his investigations would be directed at that objective.

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful for that opportunity to move on. My right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) suggested, erroneously, and in the nicest possible way, that we could easily get a conviction in similar circumstances to the Bolin case. I could not let him get away with that. As I have said before, because of some of our defence lawyers, we have difficulty getting convictions when an armed robber in this country is caught on camera in front of 12 police officers.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Mr. Maclean: I shall give way for the last time.

Mr. Garnier: The Bolin offence could not have been tried in this country because we do not have extra-territoriality. That is the end of the argument.

Mr. Maclean: Yes. We could not try that case in this country because we do not have extra-territorial jurisdiction. Some people argue, however, that, if we merely had such jurisdiction, there would be no problem, and we could convict people like Bolin. A mere change in the law does not give us carte blanche to change our rules of evidence. In similar circumstances, we would not get convictions. If it was that easy, why do we not get convictions in those countries where those crimes are committed and where we are willing to extradite those involved? In the context of these amendments, that case illustrates the differences in the legal systems of various countries—the different concepts, the different traditions, and even the different kinds of behaviour.

Conspiracy and incitement—which are at the heart of the Bill—are not recognised as criminal offences in many countries, but they may have other offences that cover some of the same ground. These amendments are necessary because it is unlikely that we would have the essential dual criminality for the incitement acts which may originate in another jurisdiction to be a criminal offence there and for us to seek a prosecution under the laws of the foreign state.

While the case of Mr. Bolin was perhaps a disappointment for those who felt that it would demonstrate that our courts could easily convict people of crimes committed abroad, it illustrated to us the need ensure that our legislation covers adequately, and to the extent that our courts can and should take jurisdiction, all the possible avenues of, in this instance, incitement that should be explored. We must leave no stone unturned, particularly as communication is so rapid and reaches all corners of the world. There is no longer any part of the globe which can truly be said to be cut off from the reach of the child molester and his propensity to incite, encourage and recruit converts to his evil ways.

Sadly, there are child molesters in all parts of this country who travel abroad to indulge in their filthy practices. They include lawyers, doctors, bank managers, social workers, manual workers, travel agents, clerks, lorry drivers and pensioners. You cannot tell that someone is a child molester just by looking at them. That is what is so difficult about dealing with these perverts—they appear to be so normal, but, secretly, they are looking for children to abuse.

I cannot say often enough: we must make the Bill a shield to protect children. Children deserve our protection no matter where they are in the world. That is why the Bill is taking powers over acts committed here in the preparation for, or furtherance of, sexual offences committed abroad.

In this context, these amendments are even more important because so often the incitement will come from abroad. One pervert will go to a country where, sadly, children are sold for sexual favours, find a brothel or a bar where these poor souls are for sale, indulge in his wicked ways, and then call his friends in the United Kingdom and tell them to come over there and indulge in the same abuse. That is incitement—the message is sent from abroad, and no matter what coded language it may be, if that is the intention and it is received here, we have caught them—and we would all say, "Hear, hear" to that.

In the past, many hon. Members have proposed that we take extra-territorial jurisdiction, and they have considered that this country, by not taking such jurisdiction, is letting these perverts get away with it. Although we are prepared to extradite our own nationals, subject to the usual rules, to stand trial in countries where an offence has been committed, it is argued that that is not enough. The country concerned may not seek extradition—indeed, we may not have an extradition arrangement with them. The proposals for an extension of the scope of incitement go some way to meeting the concern expressed by hon. Members.

It is true that we already take extra-territorial jurisdiction over a range of offences. Specific statutes have extended the criminal law to cover the conduct of persons outside the territory of England and Wales, often with the objective of implementing an international convention or of protecting a particular domestic interest. There are some precedents for taking extra-territorial jurisdiction.

There are precedents for taking extra-territorial jurisdiction. It has been suggested that the practical difficulties of mounting successful prosecutions could be overcome. The corrupt nature of the official systems in many countries could be bypassed by using non-governmental organisations to investigate allegations of abuse and to obtain the evidence necessary to secure a conviction in this country.

Perverts often return to this country with clear evidence of their crimes—video tapes, for example—and other countries have taken extra-territorial jurisdiction to deal with these offences. It has also been suggested that the United Kingdom should join the international consensus on this issue to mark its abhorrence of the activities of child molesters.

These are powerful arguments, and I treat them with great respect—I have not dismissed them lightly—but no responsible Government can rush into legislation on this and ignore the counter-arguments if there is the possibility that the legislation will be nothing more than a gesture. Criminal jurisdiction in the United Kingdom is traditionally territorially based—that is, there is an assumption that, for conduct to constitute an offence here, there must be a connection to the territory of this country. The strength of this system lies in its simplicity. Crimes are best investigated in the country where they are committed, by the relevant prosecuting authorities.

We are willing to extradite our nationals, subject to the usual rules, to stand trial abroad. We have extradition agreements with many countries. Of the states in the European Union, only the United Kingdom and Italy are completely free in extraditing their nationals, and France and Germany never do so. Where extradition agreements do not exist, ad hoc arrangements may be made in circumstances where we are satisfied that the offender will receive a fair trial.

Mr. Alison: I have a couple of points on the important area that the Minister is covering. Will he confirm that, if a country such as Thailand introduces a death penalty for child abuse, we will still extradite British nationals in conjunction with our extradition treaty? Otherwise, his extradition argument is weaker. Will he confirm that the review that he mentioned in Committee is still continuing, and that he is not announcing negative conclusions about the review in his remarks at the present time?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Minister replies, I should point out that the debate is now becoming very broad. I am not sure whether the nature of the amendment lends itself to such a wide argument.

Mr. Maclean: Naturally, you are correct, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall briefly respond to my right hon. Friend.

With all due respect, the question whether we would extradite to countries that have introduced penalties that are unacceptable to us—such as the death penalty—is bogus. This point has been made before, and it is not correct. In those circumstances, Britain seeks an assurance—a binding guarantee—that, if the person is found guilty, the death penalty will not be applied, and then we extradite. That has been our policy for some time.

In my first few weeks of moving to the Home Office, we had a case—I cannot remember its name—in which we extradited back to Morocco a student who had been accused of murder. Once we got a guarantee that he would not be executed if he was found guilty, he was extradited. That would not be any bar to extradition of people back to Thailand. If I may say so—without causing offence in international relations—some countries have no difficulty in taking rigorous action against drug dealers who are caught with drugs on them, but they seem to find enormous difficulty in taking action against perverts who abuse children.

We have not come to any conclusions on the review—we have severe doubts on the difficulties. I have taken every opportunity to point out the practical difficulties, not because I am prejudging the outcome of the review but because there are genuine difficulties. I do not want hon. Members to be under the impression that all we have to do is make a few changes to the law here and there, that Britain can then have extra-territorial jurisdiction, that a queue of perverts will be prosecuted in the British courts and found guilty, and that we will stamp out the problem. It would not work like that—although we all wish to God that it would.

Mr. Batiste: While I understand everything that my right hon. Friend has just said, I make the same comment that I made during the passage of the War Crimes Act 1991: given all the evidential difficulties, even if there are no successful prosecutions, it is still better to cause these perverts to live in fear that one day the hand will fall on their shoulders and they will be called to account for their deeds. If we do not put our laws in order to achieve that, they can come back to this country and regard it as a safe haven.

Mr. Maclean: If it worked on the basis that they would live in fear, there might be some considerable merit in what my hon. Friend says. However, I believe that they would not live in fear—they would see the law as ineffective, as it would be. If we have no prosecutions, or one prosecution every five years and it fails—as it possibly could—it would not strike terror into the hearts of potential paedophiles, molesters or those putting messages on the Internet.

To strike fear into the heart of potential criminals, we must have two things—as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has been emphasising in his sentencing proposals. We must improve the likelihood—indeed, make it certain—that people who commit such offences will be caught, and the sentence must be adequate.

We have an adequate sentence in this country, but if, as I suspect, by extending and taking extra-territorial jurisdiction we would make no difference to the possibility of someone being caught and the case being proved in court, it would be a bogus exercise.

We are not dealing with rather thick criminals. Some of these people are the cleverest in the world. They spend their whole life hiding their activities from law enforcement authorities. If people of the rank of ambassador are being charged with offences, it is obvious that such people are not the thickest people in the world, whatever country they come from. Some very clever people indulge in these practices, and any person who travels 11,000 miles around the world to indulge in them will not easily be fooled by gesture legislation.

10.30 am

I hope that, if the review does conclude that we can take sensible further steps on extra-territorial jurisdiction, it will so recommend, because it shows that in practice we shall be able to make a difference. All right hon. and hon. Members want to do that. We do not want to spend our Fridays passing legislation for the fun of it or as gesture politics. We want to make a difference.

For the present, extra-territorial jurisdiction is not the solution to the problem. It is right that the assumptions and opinions that underlie our concerns about extra-territorial jurisdiction are from time to time tested to discover whether they remain valid. That is why we have had the wide-ranging interdepartmental review announced by the Home Secretary on 1 February.

I can assure the House that my right hon. and learned Friend will carefully consider the report of that review. If it suggests that it is possible for us to enforce extra-territorial jurisdiction in the specific circumstances of sexual offences against children, I am sure that he, I, everyone in the Government and the whole House will want and expect us to act, and we shall not be backward in coming forward.

The Government condemn, without question, the activities of those monsters who prey on innocent children. We shall strive to take any measure we can to combat that dreadful trade—provided that it can be seen to be effective. The measure will be effective when the amendments are made.

I hope that hon. Members will understand from what I have had said that the amendments will complete the shield that the Bill will provide to prevent the abuse of children. I support the amendments, and the Government support them. I hope that all hon. Members will do so, so that the Bill will be as effective as possible in its aim to deter those who wish to use this country as a base to plan their evil activities.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Michael: I intend to be brief, but the debate has ranged over not only the two amendments but most of the other essential issues arising from the Bill.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on tabling the amendments, and the Minister on responding so positively to them. I am grateful especially because the amendments respond to the arguments that I and my hon. Friends made in Committee, and they bridge what we felt was a massive gap in the Bill, despite its good intentions. The amendments are of great importance in making the Bill an effective piece of legislation and in enabling it—as the Minister suggests we all seek to do—to make a difference.

Parliament has been at its best in dealing with the Bill. We had sensible but searching debates in Committee, in which many genuine arguments were made. The quality of that debate is reflected in the amendments before us. It was a worthwhile Committee stage, in which we tackled serious issues. We hoped to extend the Bill's scope and impact. That is why debate in Committee focused on extra-territoriality, on making it possible to catch the actions of offenders—especially of British citizens abroad—and on tackling incitement.

As the Minister suggested, the amendments take a considerable step down the road of making the intentions of Parliament effective in relation to incitement and conspiracy, and the activities of those who seek to promote and be involved in such unspeakable activities.

The amendments are central to making the Bill effective in that they close off the possibility of convolutions of communication to evade the intentions of the Bill as originally drafted; they toughen the Bill. The test of the Bill's success will not be the number of prosecutions alone but the certainty among the paedophile community—if we can call it that—that the powers are sufficient and prosecution is likely. The object is to prevent such activity, and success in preventing the activity will be success for the Bill.

Several references were made to extra-territoriality. The example of the War Crimes Act 1991 comes to mind. We would not regard Parliament as having been wrong or consider that the 1991 Act had failed if there were no successful prosecutions. It would still be right, because the principle was right, the intention was right and Parliament was right to pass it. The question is, what should Parliament do about the activities of our citizens abroad, and how should we extend the law? That is what the Home Secretary's inquiry is supposed to be about, and the House needs to debate the question as soon as possible.

We want the Government to go further—if not by extending territoriality, in other ways. Extradition is insufficient, for reasons that I gave in Committee and shall not repeat. The economy and tourism of some countries may receive a devastating impact if they exercise the rights through agreement of extradition, so it is not as simple for them as it would be for us if it arose from the activities of one of our nationals abroad.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) has emphasised several times, we need to find ways of ensuring that we act in concert with the international community to make our actions effective, whether through international agreements, international law or international action. I hope that the Minister will ensure that we are represented and involved in some of the international meetings and conventions that aim to improve the quality of action on such matters by the international community.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman has hit the point. If we wish to move into extra-territoriality, the way to do so is by international co-operation, by conventions such as the Tokyo convention and other conventions allowing courts in this country to extend their jurisdiction to, for example, offences in aeroplanes over other people's jurisdictions. That is the way to do it—not to introduce extra-territoriality into the Bill, but to reach agreement and become party to a convention, and then introduce that convention into English law.

Mr. Michael: It does not help to extend that debate as we debate the Bill. Those steps should be taken, and we would urge the Government to take them. Extra-territoriality needs to be debated; we debated it in Committee. I believe that all members of the Committee accepted that we could not push further on the Bill without risking the Bill itself, and that it was important to proceed with the Bill with the improvements that have been accepted today, get it on the statute book and make that great improvement. Without today's amendments, we should not have regarded the measure as effective, but it now becomes effective.

The debate about extra-territoriality—whether we should proceed by combined international action or international statute or convention, and whether extra-territoriality in British law can and should play a part—should be left to another day. I urge the Minister to ensure that the outcome of the inquiries and discussion set in place by the Home Secretary is brought before the House for proper discussion as soon as possible, so that we can all share in a discussion of the pros and cons.

I have no doubt that, as the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) suggests, there is a downside to that line of approach. We want to ensure that, if that line of approach is rejected, other measures are put in place to ensure that we are effective in the international community. That point unites us across the Floor of the House. I do not want to develop that discussion now, although it should be held as soon as possible. Today, we should welcome the fact that we are moving forward. Enforcement is a different matter from what we seek to enforce, and we are dealing with the second of those issues.

I am pleased that the discussions have extended into how we deal with the Internet. It is clear that the Internet presents a range of new opportunities for the promotion of such activities. If material is made available on the Internet, it should not allow someone to evade the intention of United Kingdom law. Our responsibility in relation to our citizens' activities will be covered by the amendments.

The freedoms of the Internet need to be balanced by powers to deal with the misuse of that freedom; rights and freedoms must be balanced against responsibilities. I am pleased that the amendments recognise that fact; they are simple and straightforward, and achieve, in a stylish way, the intentions that we sought to press in Committee.

We have taken a step forward, and are speeding the Bill on its way with the two amendments; I hope that the Minister will soon say, not just that he and the Home Secretary have had many interesting discussions and agonised over the midnight oil, but how the UK can fulfil its international obligations—particularly in relation to our citizens—in its attempts to end the vile trade and activities of paedophiles. I hope that the House will tackle the issues that the Minister tells us that he and his officials have been addressing—the question whether or not an extension into extra-territorial jurisdiction is appropriate. We must hold that debate, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that the House will be able to have it at the earliest possible date.

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): If our discussions so far have raised a number of different aspects, it is because the amendments represent the quintessence of the purpose of the legislation and the problems that go with it. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) was right to say in introducing the amendments that the Bill needs to take account of changing technology. There is no question but that the law and the legal advice which follows it usually move at a much slower rate than technological advances.

Statute law moves at a ponderous pace. My right hon. Friend the Minister has said that he has confidence in the robustness of common law to cope with the challenge of changing circumstances and conditions, but when making legislation in this place we tend to lumber behind and do not keep up to date with the most novel, shrewd and devilishly clever developments associated with so many of the greatest minds in this country and elsewhere. I support the amendments and I particularly welcome the fact that in two words—"however communicated"—we can identify any means of communication and make it an offence if an act of incitement is committed through a message sent from one country to any part of the United Kingdom.

I yield to no one in the degree of distaste and abhorrence that I feel for the sexual abuse of children, which lies at the heart of the Bill. I wish to see such evil eradicated at the earliest possible moment, wherever it occurs in the world. My role in the debates—on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report—has inevitably been to be something of a damp blanket on the fires of enthusiasm of so many hon. Members. I find myself to one side of my colleagues from Yorkshire, which is a rare experience for me, particularly in relation to my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), for whose views I have so much sympathy and whom I support on most occasions. I have reservations about how far the Bill can go in dealing with the problem of extra-territoriality.

My right hon. Friend the Minister has stressed the importance of certainty. We must have regard not only to ourselves, but to public opinion outside this place. Nothing undermines the confidence of the British people in their Parliament more than when we assert that we can achieve things—through law, declaration or decision in this House—and the public later find that the law falls short of their expectations. There is considerable danger in not recognising that the Bill, welcome as it is and commendable as the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South are in introducing it, has a limited contribution to make in combating the scourge of child abuse elsewhere in the world.

Mr. Congdon: I have listened carefully to my hon. Friend's concerns about bringing the House into disrepute, but does he share my concern about an opposing aspect? The fact that the House has been unable to go further in terms of extra-territoriality has led many people to send postcards to hon. Members asking why we are doing nothing about this vile and evil trade. It is difficult to strike the right balance when reassuring public opinion.

Sir Michael Neubert: It is a difficult balance to strike, but it is made more difficult because those postcards—a number of which I have received from my constituents—do not bear the sender's name and address. Hon. Members are therefore denied the opportunity to write to explain their position and the difficulties that they face. We can merely issue general press releases, which probably do not reach those people. That is one message which should get through, but does not, and I have expressed my regret about it on more than one occasion. The postcards raise a number of serious questions and may not contain factually correct information.

Extra-territoriality is the essence of the Bill. We are dealing with crimes committed abroad, particularly in countries without our centuries of tradition, whose legal systems are less developed than ours and where it is much more difficult to deal with such problems. A number of references have been made to the War Crimes Act 1991—the recent and most relevant example of claiming extra-territoriality. I have expressed reservations about that legislation. I supported it in principle, as did many others, but I have the gravest doubts about its effectiveness in practice. Since our discussions in Committee, the first charges have been brought against a man in this country for offences committed abroad during the second world war. We now await the outcome of that case. Millions of pounds have already been spent in bringing that man to court and the police exercise involved has made huge demands on already limited resources, but there is no guarantee that even that one case will achieve a conviction. We must therefore act responsibly when proposing legislation calling for extra-territoriality which has little chance of success.

The amendments are optimistic. Let us consider the technical aspect of the message. How feasible is it that we should be able to identify the messages and identify an offence? How would they be identified, whether on the Internet or on the telephone? Are we to tap everyone's telephone to find out how individual calls are gauged? Even the word "message" raises difficulties. I do not believe that a simple statement of fact could be held to be a message without a great deal of circumstantial evidence. A message must mean the conveying of a sentiment from one person to another, not a neutral statement of fact. There would be scope in court to mount a defence against a simple bulletin board, which might be described as such, but could be presented as something quite different.

What about the scope of the Internet? Like many of my hon. Friends, I am not the most technically qualified. However, I understand that the Internet contains a wealth of information beyond imagining. Who will scan that vast amount of information to identify the offence dealt with in the amendments? We must be careful not to raise too many expectations.

As a non-lawyer, I find it difficult to accept the charge of incitement. I do not think that it is appropriate to the activity described. My understanding of "incitement" is reflected in the recent events in Brixton, when the lawyer Rudy Narayan addressed a crowd in the street and threatened retribution against the police for the death of a man in custody. His remarks caused an outbreak of rioting in the streets and damage to property. I believe that that is an example of incitement.

The sexual abuse of children does not involve someone going on to the streets and inciting otherwise normal people to comply: it is a case of seeking willing—indeed eager—partners to engage in the evil practice of child abuse. If two willing parties wish to come together through the Internet or by telephone, it will be extraordinarily difficult to identify whether incitement has occurred. In a simple information exchange, the charge of incitement will be difficult to nail down.

Nevertheless, I am anxious that the Bill should achieve as much as it can and I support the amendments. In describing the Bill as a "shield" for the protection of children around the world—to quote my right hon. Friend the Minister—we must be modest in our aspirations and not allow ourselves to be carried beyond the realms of reality.

Lady Olga Maitland: I give my wholehearted support to the amendments—they are so important that it is extraordinary that the provisions were not included in the Bill in the first place. How can we contemplate taking tough action to curb the sexual abuse of children by tourists if we deal with only half the issue? Clearly, the means by which such people communicate with each other is the key to the Bill.

I find it difficult to comprehend the sheer scale of the sexual exploitation. Most people find it hard to believe that paedophiles are sophisticated and devious people who will go to any lengths and use any means to achieve their ends. Although the amendments try to close any loopholes through which such people could dodge, weave and dive in an attempt to achieve their evil objectives, I endorse the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) who said that we should not get too excited about the Bill being the whole answer, as it is only part of a package that may have to be addressed later with other legislation.

I accept that it will be difficult to prove and to find positive evidence that people have sent offensive material electronically. Earlier today I raised the question of telephone calls. Will hearsay evidence of a telephone call be admissible, or may telephone calls be intercepted, thereby taking us into a difficult area? Perhaps there should be some cut-off point at which we say that, because an alleged offence is so terrible, we should consider that course of action. Faxes are tangible objects that may be presented as evidence. I believe that messages by fax can also be intercepted, but I am not sure how.

Mr. John Marshall: People can send them to the wrong number.

Lady Olga Maitland: Yes, but they would then be categorised as unsolicited material. As my right hon. Friend the Minister pointed out, if one is the innocent recipient of such material, one is not liable to be charged with any offence.

All hon. Members have referred to the fact that the Internet—which I believe may become a modern curse—is too vast and it is all too easy to surf the system and pursue one's own ends. Although we have the power to make it an offence to receive or pick up offensive material from the Internet, I am concerned that it will be extremely difficult to produce evidence of that act. How do we link the material with a prosecution? I am not saying that the provision should not be in the Bill—it should be on the face of the legislation—but we must recognise the problem that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford pointed out. The Bill may not be the complete answer, although it is a very important step.

I urge hon. Members to cast their eye over the schedule of listed sexual offences. Any normal, decent human being who reads that list would shudder with horror—it highlights the fact that we must make the Bill work effectively. For instance, the Bill will deal with crimes of rape under the Sexual Offences Act 1956. Those offences include intercourse with a girl under the age of 13, intercourse with a girl under the age of 16, buggery, and indecent assault on a boy or a girl. When confronted with such a list, no normal human being could be other than utterly determined to protect our young people.

Children should be able to trust adults. When that trust is abused, we have a moral obligation to protect them in whatever way we can. Although there may be some doubts about the efficacy of the amendments, it is prudent to include them. We should remember that we are talking about children's trust. The amendments are important because they toughen the Bill and cause paedophiles concern that they may be caught. If the measures act as a deterrent, well and good. If they help us to catch sex offenders, even better: I believe that they deserve to roast in hell, and they certainly have the worst time of it in jail where sex offenders are shown no mercy. The amendments are welcome if they help to bring evil men to justice.

Mr. Batiste: I welcome the opportunity to contribute to the debate, for a number of reasons. First and foremost, I express my strong support for the legislation, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on selecting a Bill with such a worthwhile aim. It is relatively rare to win in the private Members' Bills ballot—I have not managed it during several years in this place—and my hon. Friend may be satisfied in the knowledge that he will have put on the statute book provisions that will make a significant difference to the lot of those around the world who suffer as a consequence of the actions of depraved, criminal perverts.

Having said that, I can give the Bill only two cheers, as I believe that it should go much further. We shall have to return to the issue with other more extensive legislation in the future.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are not yet on Third Reading. We are debating two amendments.

Mr. Batiste: I appreciate that, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, my opening comments remove the need for me to make a speech on Third Reading. I shall now turn to the specific points arising from the amendments.

The amendments improve the Bill quite specifically because they reach, albeit tentatively, into the issue of extra-territoriality and extend the remit of the Bill to electronic communications. Without either of those steps forward, the Bill would be much more restricted.

[Mr. Batiste]

I have long been involved with extra-territoriality and Internet issues. "Extra-territoriality" is a tongue twister which is much easier to pronounce at 11 o'clock in the morning than at 11 o'clock at night, and it covers a wide range of complex issues. In the early to mid-1980s, the Americans sought to use it as an excuse for imposing their domestic legislation on other countries and, along with many other hon. Members, I fought strongly against that.

There is legislation on our statute book to enable British companies and individuals to resist the extra-territorial demands of countries such as the United States. It has therefore been assumed that extra-territoriality meant the imposition by one country of its views on others, but times have changed and extra-territoriality now means something quite different, as it does in the context of today's debate. In terms of the development of the thinking of the House of Commons, it went a great deal further when we introduced the War Crimes Bill. A number of hon. Members who are here today were, with me, strong supporters of the War Crimes Bill.

The rationale behind that measure and the reason why so many of us want this Bill to progress is that, whatever the problems are—and we accept that there are problems in relation to evidence and bringing a case within the confines of the procedures of the British courts—nevertheless, in today's world, with its rapid communications, electronic media and the internationalisation of crime, there must be a residual responsibility on a state such as ours to punish its citizens for serious crimes that they commit overseas.

It may not be a primary responsibility, because it is better for such crimes to be punished in the country where they are committed, but if for any reason that is impractical or impossible, or if extradition is impracticable, we in Britain should be able to undertake criminal proceedings. At the end of the day, those who commit serious crimes—particularly crimes which affect small children in distant parts of the world who are unable to protect themselves and whose Governments may not be able to protect them—should not be able to return to Britain and see it as a safe haven in which to plan and plot further trips in future.

I accept what my right hon. Friend the Minister said about the importance of trying to establish the certainty and success of prosecution and imposing serious penalties on those being convicted. Given those reservations, the difference between what my right hon. Friend said this morning, and what I, other hon. Members and many people in Britain believe, is that there is also a declaratory role for the law. Many paedophiles have a status in society and are afraid of exposure. In some circumstances, the fact that there is a mechanism in place which could bring them to book will be a powerful means of protecting some of the most vulnerable people in the world.

I have spoken out on many occasions against extra-territoriality as a form of legislative colonialism which seeks to impose the domestic laws of one country upon other countries, but this is a different and benign manifestation of extra-territoriality in which we seek to ensure that our citizens observe the laws of this land and do not regard Britain as a safe base from which to commit serious crimes overseas in the belief that they can escape retribution in the countries where those crimes are committed.

I now turn briefly to the Internet. Although the amendments before us are entirely sound in relation to newspaper articles, advertisements, letters and telephone calls, where there is a clear connection between the person sending a message and the person receiving it, the Internet creates entirely new and complex problems for law makers. The Internet opens up free speech around the world in electronic form. I do not believe that it is possible or practicable—although some people say it might be—to prevent that, and to try to do so would be to deny free speech. However, if people break the law in the context of expressing themselves they should be punished for it.

I see no reason why my determination to protect people's right to self-expression on the Internet should not be coupled with an equal determination that those who abuse the right to free speech through the electronic media should be punished. It may be technologically difficult, but I am sure that the technology will develop alongside the Government's determination to make sure that the electronic media are not abused. We protect the right of free speech, but there are a series of criminal offences relating to its misuse to incite riots, to which reference has been made, and other crimes. I see no reason why the same framework should not apply to the Internet.

I have looked carefully at the drafting of the amendments, and although I was delighted to hear the clear assurances from my right hon. Friend the Minister that he believes that the amendments extend the legislation to the Internet, I am not quite so sure about that. In particular, the amendment refers to "a message . . . sent or received in England and Wales".

I find it difficult to see how we can express in such geographical terms a message that is put on a bulletin board by a person in Bangkok, for example, which does not exist in any physical form, but merely in electronic form, and which can be accessed by any person around the world.

I am not sure that such a message is ever "received". It would have been better to express it in terms of a message being read by a person in the United Kingdom, as that would have little or no ambiguity. I do not profess any real expertise in the drafting of such legislation, but I hope that the assurance that my right hon. Friend has given is correct.

Mr. Garnier: Would the use of the word "published", as it applies in the law of defamation, be of assistance? In that sense, it means making known to a third party. Would that be of assistance to my hon. Friend?

Mr. Batiste: We are fortunate to have available free of charge the advice of one of the most eminent barristers in the country on such matters. I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend's wise words will be taken on board by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South, who has done such a splendid job in promoting the Bill, to see whether there is a weakness that could be addressed.

It is clear that, throughout the House and throughout the country, there is a strong determination that we should live up to our obligations under article 34 of the United Nations convention to prevent the sexual exploitation of children around the world. The Bill takes a small step in that direction, and for that reason I strongly welcome it. Nevertheless, further steps need to be taken. If the Government, in their review of the issue of extra-territoriality, can go a step further, there will be a wide welcome for further legislation.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6

SCOTTISH PROVISION

Amendment made: No. 2, in page 4, line 26, at end insert—

'( ) Any act of incitement by means of a message (however communicated) is to be treated as done in Scotland if the message is sent or received in Scotland'.—[Mr. John Marshall.]

Order for Third Reading read.

11.9 am

Mr. John Marshall: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I hope that I am reflecting the mood of the House when I say that, following our debates on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report, I detect widespread support for the Bill coupled with a feeling of regret that it may not go as far in some respects as some of my colleagues would like. One of the things that appals the whole country is the depths of depravity to which some individuals will go and the extent of the problem in certain other countries.

An article in The Times on 10 April stated that some 200,000 Nepalese children had been sold into sexual slavery in India. It stated that, in Thailand, as many as a quarter of a million children were in brothels and that, in Colombia, one third of all prostitutes were thought to be under the age of 14. One could go on and refer to countries such as Romania where many children become prostitutes at an age at which, in this country, one would hope that they enjoyed the innocence of childhood.

Those countries have a great deal to do. They must realise that the good of their children and the future of their country must come before taking a few cheap bucks from disgusting western tourists. That is the problem with which they have to deal, but we must try to help them. I do not pretend that the passage of the Bill will put an end to the disgraceful activities of British child molesters who travel abroad to pursue their disgusting activities. It will not. I suspect that, at the end of the day, there is nothing that we can do to stop some of them, but we can certainly make it more difficult for them. We can ensure that individuals in this country who seek to make a trade or a business out of encouraging other people to molest young children find it much more difficult to do so.

Those who attended the Second Reading debate will remember that I referred to a publication that was going around Hampshire. People were paying a large amount to get a guide to sexual holidays in the far east and Latin America. I was pleased to hear that, the week after the Bill received its Second Reading, the individuals who had been distributing the publication decided that it had become too hot to handle and took it out of circulation. We have done some good already.

I shall briefly remind the House of what the Bill does, clause by clause. Clause 1 makes it an offence to conspire in England and Wales to commit certain sexual offences against children abroad. Conspiracy means agreement on a course of conduct. It would certainly include arrangements between a tour operator and a client to provide travel facilities where an acknowledged purpose of the trip was the sexual abuse of children. But the clause goes much wider than that.

Many of these creatures, although they make their own arrangements for travel and accommodation, plan their trips with others of their kind. It is not unknown for a group of paedophiles to talk in the United Kingdom about what they might do when they go to, for example, Thailand, Romania, Colombia or Peru. They plan their trip, and then go abroad and engage in their disgraceful activities.

Clause 1 also sets certain conditions which must be satisfied before the conspiracy amounts to an offence under our laws. The conspiracy must lead to an act or event taking place outside the United Kingdom. That, of course, is what the Bill is all about. If the act or event contemplated takes place in this country, the conspiracy is already an offence. The act or event must be an offence in the country in which it is intended to take place. That is the so-called dual criminality test, and it is an important safeguard because we must recognise that the age of consent is different in, for example, various European Community countries.

We in Parliament rightly consider that it is our function to pass laws that apply in the territory of the United Kingdom. We would take great exception if the law-making body of another country attempted to pass laws that would apply here. If, for example, an Arab country where drink was forbidden made it an offence for someone to go to Scotland and have a glass of the local nectar, we would regard that as offensive against our laws and against that great industry. I am sure that no one agrees with that point more strongly than my right hon. Friend the Minister.

The intended act must amount to conduct that falls within the scope of the sexual offences against children set out in the schedule. The final condition is that some part of the conspiracy, but not necessarily all the conduct that constitutes the offence, must take place in England and Wales. I think that it would be better to say the United Kingdom—and long may it remain a united kingdom—because all parts of it are covered by the Bill. The hon. Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg) made the good point in Committee that the Bill emphasises the need for a United Kingdom Parliament. If we had a devolved Scottish Assembly legislating on Scottish matters, there could be different rules in England and Wales, and in Scotland. I note the way in which hon. Members intervened on that issue.

Clause 2 makes it an offence to incite another person to commit certain sexual acts against children abroad. Incitement is the act of encouraging others to do something. The amendments to which we agreed earlier have strengthened the powers in the Bill. People who use informative advertising, as they would call it, by putting messages on the Internet will now be covered by the Bill. The Bill could include advertising material in the case of tour operators. However, if two or more perverts discuss where to go to indulge in their activities, any encouragement one gives to the other may well amount to incitement.

The other clauses give the law enforcement agencies a good chance of erecting a substantial barrier against these disgusting activities. The penalties under the Bill are substantial, and for certain acts of conspiracy the penalty could amount to life imprisonment. That shows how strong and tough the legislation can be.

If we are to put a stop to those disgusting activities and children of eight, nine and 10 being sold into a life of sexual perversion at a time when they should not know anything about sex, it is up to the Governments of these countries to move. We have seen that they are willing to move strongly against the drug trade. They must move just as strongly against prostitution by young 10, 11 and 12-year-olds.

It is up to the Governments of Thailand, the Philippines and Latin America to say that they want to stop that disgusting trade and that they put the future of their children first. Those Governments must ensure that their children lead a decent life, rather than having the whole of their lives blackened by activities that take place when they are so young. They should not be affected by the disgusting perverts who travel to other countries and who engage in such disgraceful behaviour.

Some lives may be so blackened by those individuals that the children involved lead a very short life, because they may be infected. If they are not infected physically, their morale and their psyche are infected for the rest of their days. Anything that the House can do to put a stop to that trade and to penalise those wicked individuals who seek to make money out of it is to be welcomed. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. Cox: I pay the warmest tribute to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). Many of us regard him as a good friend, and he has done a great service to the House and to the country by presenting the Bill. We all know, whatever part of the country we represent, about the correspondence that we receive from constituents calling for tough legislation. Nothing sickens people more than the sexual exploitation of children and, especially, the behaviour of nationals from our country who travel abroad solely to engage in the abuse of young people. We also know, because the point was made by many hon. Members on Second Reading, in which countries those practices take place.

We have also had information circulated to us by highly respected organisations that have long campaigned for major changes in legislation, not only in our country but throughout the world. No organisation has been more involved than the United Nations Children's Fund. UNICEF has done superb work for many years, not only to reduce the sexual abuse of young people but to improve the general overall welfare of young people and children throughout the world.

As I said on Second Reading, I am one of the members of the House's delegation to the Council of Europe. I serve on the Social, Health and Family Affairs Committee and, at the time of Second Reading, as the rapporteur I had just completed and presented the strategy for children to the Assembly of the Council of Europe. That strategy was fully supported by UNICEF and I was greatly aided by that organisation, which sent officials from the United States to work with me and other colleagues in Strasbourg on that important legislation. In view of the importance of the Bill, it is interesting that the European strategy for children had overwhelming and virtually unanimous support from every member state of the Council of Europe. That is now a large organisation embracing not only the countries of western Europe but virtually all the countries from central Europe, including the new Russia.

In Strasbourg next week, next Thursday and Friday, there will be a two-day conference—a world congress—on the sexual exploitation of children, organised by the Council of Europe and UNICEF. That is why the Bill is so important.

Lady Olga Maitland: When the hon. Gentleman goes to Strasbourg, will he raise with his colleagues the issue of extra-territorial jurisdiction? Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House how other countries are working on that issue?

Mr. Cox: The hon. Lady makes an important point. Many of the points that she has made in her interventions have been raised by many other hon. Members. I did not table any amendments to the Bill, but I sympathised very much with the feelings of other hon. Members that what was proposed did not go far enough. I will come on to the points that the hon. Lady has raised. Next Friday, I will chair the congress's session and I will certainly seek to raise her points.

The Council of Europe and UNICEF regard the conference as very important. Senior politicians from European countries will attend, as will senior officers from Interpol. UNICEF officers will attend from the United States and a senior judge of the European Court of Human Rights will attend and speak. That shows the great importance that is attached to the conference.

Many of the subjects that the hon. Member for Hendon, South has raised on Second Reading, in Committee and today are connected to the issues that we will discuss next week. The sessions of the conference will cover "sexual exploitation, pornography and prostitution of, and trafficking in, children and young adults".

The Minister of State has an opportunity today to give the House some idea of the Government's involvement in the conference. I am sure that we are all pleased that the Bill is in no way a party issue. Sadly, we often destroy good private Members' Bills, irrespective of who has introduced them, because party politics come into play. Thankfully, that has not happened to the Bill so far, and I do not intend to do that today. The Bill is far too important for anyone to indulge in that kind of behaviour, but it is important that we learn what attitude the Government will take to the conference next week.

Hon. Members have spoken today about the ways in which information is now circulated. I remember the impressive speech made on Second Reading by the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), who has made one or two interventions this morning. No doubt he will speak later if he catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman outlined the type of information and publicity that is sent out by companies, and I was delighted to learn from the hon. Member for Hendon, South that, after comments made on Second Reading, one company decided that enough was enough and that it could not continue to operate. I hope that we will hear about more such decisions by such companies.

We have also heard about the Internet. Many of us have some idea of how it works, but the extent of the power base now being established must concern all hon. Members.

In our previous debate, the Minister fairly answered interventions and outlined the real difficulties that face Britain and other countries trying to take action, but which are restricted by current laws. I hope that this Bill is but the first of many that will help to overcome that problem.

Item 10 on today's Order Paper is the Second Reading of the Sexual Offences against Children (Registers of Offenders) Bill, to be introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson). I hope that there will be some progress with that Bill because it ties in closely with this Bill and the efforts of the hon. Member for Hendon, South. When I speak to those who work with young children, such as probation officers, the police and UNICEF, they say that a register would provide them with a wide base from which to operate against offenders. Although that Bill will not be reached today, I hope that, when it comes before the House in the coming weeks, it will be given a fair chance of progress.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I must remind him of the rule that Third Reading debates deal with the contents of the Bill before the House.

Mr. Cox: I fully accept your comments, Madam Deputy Speaker, and I will not pursue my point. I simply wished to draw the attention of the House to the fact that we will shortly discuss another Bill that is relevant to the Bill that we are discussing.

Mr. Michael: Several times during the passage of the Bill, hon. Members have paid tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend, on our behalf, in the international arena. It is important to know what image we present on this Bill and wider. Is the United Kingdom seen as being active enough in the area in which my hon. Friend plays a leading role in debate?

Mr. Cox: My hon. Friend's question is interesting. I have already referred to the two-day conference in Strasbourg next week. That has been in the making for a long time; it was not a thought that suddenly popped into someone's mind a month ago. I have the provisional agenda for the conference, and I regret to say that it appears that no British Minister will attend.

Mr. Maclean: No Minister will attend the conference next week because it is a planning meeting for civil servants. The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), will attend the conference proper at Stockholm in August, and he will play a leading role.

Mr. Cox: I had intended to question the Minister on that point, so I am delighted to hear his assurance that a Minister will attend the Stockholm conference. I do not want to pursue the matter at great length, but I must point out that senior Ministers from other countries will attend the conference in Strasbourg next week. I referred to the Stockholm conference on Second Reading. I shall attend as the Council of Europe representative.

Delegates' speeches, which give a clear outline of Governments' thinking on any issue, are important, but so are the informal discussions and meetings that take place. At Stockholm in August and, I hope, in Strasbourg next week, the important points raised by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) will be dealt with, not only in the papers presented by speakers but in informal discussions among colleagues from all countries.

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. He has been kind and even-handed in his remarks. He pointed out the importance of politicians attending conferences. Perhaps he will take this opportunity to put on the record a tribute to the National Criminal Intelligence Service, which picks up where politicians leave off and pursue paedophiles around the world to bring them to justice. Can he tell us, from his experience and knowledge, whether any other country in Europe has a criminal intelligence service as dedicated or as experienced as the NCIS in this activity or as good at bringing paedophiles to book?

Mr. Cox: I readily join the Minister in congratulating and appreciating the work of the NCIS. I am delighted that Britain is in the forefront of such work. However, other countries are also deeply involved. All countries need to put proper machinery into operation. That is why a senior official from Interpol will attend the conference at Strasbourg next week.

I warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South on introducing the Bill. It deals with an issue on which much work still needs to be done—and, I am sure, will be done by hon. Members of all parties. As I have said, it is not a party issue. There is enormous support from organisations in this country. We also have the support of our fellow countries in Europe and others around the world. I hope that the Bill will become law. As has already been said, it will be the first of many further such Bills aimed at preventing the appalling abuse that, sadly, is carried out by our nationals and those of many other countries against often totally defenceless young children.

11.37 am

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on bringing the Bill before the House.

I was tempted to make a modest contribution by what my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) said on Second Reading:

> "You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, almost certainly agree that nearly every aspect of the sexual abuse and molestation of children is shocking, and often unimaginably shocking. It is sometimes too painful even to bear contemplation. I think of the picture of the child chained to a bed and burnt to death in a massage parlour that was incinerated, by accident or by design, in an Asian country. That is what the police found. There is an almost unimaginably horrific dimension to the abuse of children, but that is what we are dealing with. Our motivation for sitting on comfortable green Benches on a Friday, with spring approaching, in an advanced western country, is the thought of that child chained to a bed and burnt to death."—[Official Report, 2 February 1996; Vol. 270, c. 1238.]

The Bill deals with a disturbing aspect of late 20th century society—the increase in the sex trade, and in particular paedophilia, which I describe as child molesting.

Only recently, society has received a stark reminder of the behaviour of paedophiles. Although Thomas Hamilton, who was responsible for the Dunblane massacre, was not a convicted paedophile, he has been linked to a paedophile ring. Tightening the laws surrounding paedophiles is a must. Police superintendents in England and Wales want convicted paedophiles to be forced to notify the authorities when they change their name or address so that they cannot slip back into society under an assumed identity and subject other youngsters to abuse.

[Mr. David Evans]

The House should support the Bill. It should certainly refrain from indulging in arguments about the rights of perverts. It is important that we view paedophilia and paedophiles in context, always remembering that the civil liberties of children must come before those of paedophiles. How often, to our extreme frustration and that of the general public, do judges and magistrates seem to favour the criminal, and victims feel that the punishment did not fit the crime? I very much hope that, when a paedophile is committed to prison for a life sentence, it is a life sentence.

People say to me, "He killed my daughter because he was drunk and driving his car. His sentence was to lose his licence for three years, and two years' probation." The sentence should have been 15 years in prison, because, in my book, he committed murder. Or I hear people say, "He raped my daughter, but the judge said, 'Send him on a holiday, the girl will soon get over it.'" Yes, we are now tackling the problem with longer prison sentences, but will the judges give the maximum sentence?

Why not castrate paedophiles and rapists straight away? Then the taxpayer would not have to foot the bill, and there would be more room in prisons for other offenders. In my view, convicted paedophiles should suffer the same fate as rapists.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South seeks to make it an offence to conspire to commit, or incite a person to commit, certain sexual acts with children abroad. The focus of the Bill is on stopping those who operate in the evil world of sexual exploitation of children, and limiting the opportunities of any would-be participants. As the country's lawmakers, we cannot simply turn a blind eye to the organisations which operate outside the United Kingdom, and arrange for financial benefit trips to third-world countries for men to violate children.

It is important that we as Members of Parliament send a strong signal to society that such behaviour will not be tolerated. That signal should not merely restrict the trade but end it completely.

To date, the Government have transformed the legal position in England and Wales with a series of tough new controls on videos, indecent displays, sex shops and child pornography. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary's Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, which proved so controversial, introduced measures designed to tighten enforcement of the obscene publications legislation, including provisions to extend and clarify the law to cover simulated child pornography manufactured and stored on computer, ensure that improper transmissions were covered by the Obscene Publications Act 1959, and give the police new powers to arrest without warrant those who dealt in obscene material, and new powers of search and seizure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South has introduced a Bill which continues in this vein, building on successive Conservative reforms to stamp out subversive and perverse behaviour. The aim of the Bill is that the operators and organisers as well as the participants would be found liable. I believe that that is right. We should make those who promote paedophilia subject to the same tough sentences as those who practise it.

Parliament should look closely at the means available to operators to promote and attract business. I am primarily concerned with the magazines that lie on the top shelves of newsagents nationwide. The porn industry has been one of the growth industries of the past 20 years. Newsagents, both independent and high-street branches—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman of the point that I made not many minutes ago? The content of the Bill is the only proper matter for consideration on Third Reading. The hon. Gentleman is going rather wide of that.

Mr. Evans: May I point out that Ann Mayne of the Campaign Against Pornography highlighted how pornographic magazines were used by operators to promote such holidays? Access is easy; curbing it is difficult. As a country and a society, we adhere to the principles of freedom of speech, and we already have in place tough laws on obscene publications.

Sir Michael Neubert: In the context of the remarks that my hon. Friend has just made, will he with me deplore the apparent new practice of W. H. Smith of sending such magazines unsolicited to newsagents as part of a package of publications that they might sell? Is it not the role of a responsible public company to do rather better than that?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend hits the nail on the head. It is outrageous that such public companies should send directly to newsagents, with information that they should go on the top shelf in the shop, unsolicited magazines which encourage people to do exactly what we are trying to stop them doing. I agree with my hon. Friend's point.

I have also been informed that operators promote paedophilia through coded advertisements in the personal columns of broadsheets such as The Times. That complicates the issue, because it highlights the options available to operators to contact would-be clients, and makes the introduction of specific legislation very difficult. It also clouds the issue of legally proving guilt—defined as being a party to the conspiracy.

While adverts in pornographic magazines might be ambiguous or even overt, adverts in broadsheets will be coded and covert. That presents a problem in making those who publish advertisements promoting porn rings and sex holidays for paedophiles liable in the same sense—that they are a party to the conspiracy.

If adverts are covert and coded, publishers might not be aware of the true intentions of those who place them. Nevertheless, if advertisements are deemed by a judge to be sufficiently overt, it is only right that the title involved should be found guilty as a party to the conspiracy or incitement. Punishing not only the operators but those that carry advertisements that promote paedophilia is a necessary aspect of the drive to stop people profiting from the perverse fantasies of paedophiles.

That has two further implications. First, newspapers have an added responsibility for monitoring the advertisements that they wish to carry. Secondly, it provides an incentive for the publishers of pornographic magazines, the main channel for such information, to start regulating the advertisements that fill their pages.

One unfortunate but likely consequence of the Bill's introduction will be to drive operators even further underground. However, that is not a reason for not passing it. It may make guilt harder to prove, as operators will take more measures to cover their tracks and avoid explicitly declaring the true nature of trips abroad.

One of the focuses of the Bill is avoiding the use of the testimony of minors who have been violated. The focus is on proving beyond all reasonable doubt the guilt of suspected organisers and racketeers before fellow members of their ring or customers leave the country specifically to go on a pervert or paedophile holiday. If that cannot be ascertained, it seems inevitable that the investigating officers would require the testimony of minors from foreign countries to corroborate their evidence to prove guilt beyond all reasonable doubt. That would not necessarily defeat the object of the Bill, but it could be argued that it would undermine it.

The Bill relies on dual criminality. A would-be customer's conduct on a prearranged trip would need to violate the law of the land and that of England and Wales. For instance, organisers could send a person to Thailand on the understanding that young girls would be available, and arrange for girls of 15 years and upwards.

As 15 is the legal age of consent in Thailand, but is a year lower than in England and Wales, the Bill could not bring such operators to court. If men abroad then indulged in sex with girls under 15, that would be a case for the Thai authorities. The Bill makes no provision for a trial in the UK, as the organisers claimed that only girls over 15 years of age would be available.

Whether we should make men stand trial in the UK for such crimes, as opposed to allowing them to stand trial in the country concerned, is a vexed question. If the authorities involved will co-operate, it is largely irrelevant whether the case is heard in Britain or abroad. Without co-operative counterparts, our police force would be hampered in bringing a successful prosecution to court, in this country or any other.

There is a need to forge close co-operation at many levels for successful detection of such sex rackets. That statement appeals mainly to law enforcement agencies in other countries, whose record for co-operation leaves a lot to be desired. However, an effective working relationship between the agencies of law enforcement in the United Kingdom and other countries is essential if we are to be able to prove that operators in the United Kingdom are sending people on prearranged pervert or paedophile holidays.

The Conservative party is committed to giving the police the support necessary to convict criminals. I only hope that the same can be said for Opposition Members. I know that their record on that is patchy, to say the least. They too often seem to be concerned with the civil rights of criminals.

Mr. Michael: I realise that the hon. Gentleman has a reputation for introducing controversy where none exists, but the debates on the Bill have been constructive and cross-party. His partisan approach is not necessary, especially from a supporter of a Government who have doubled crime and allowed levels of violence to continue to rocket.

Mr. Evans: I do not wish to be controversial. There should be a greater sense of certainty and severity in sentencing. The Conservative Government, and especially my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, have not forgotten that prisons should not be holiday camps. Prison regimes should be tough—so tough that criminals want to get out of prison, and not try to get back in as soon as they can.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has rather a short memory. I said that he should deal only with the contents of the Bill on Third Reading.

Mr. Evans: On paedophiles, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary—and I agree with every word—last December said:

"The full force of the law must be used against the evil people who sexually exploit children for money.

It is an abhorrent activity. We must do all we can to prevent it and protect children everywhere.

We have looked carefully at the problem and have decided the most effective way our legal system can deal with it is to extend our laws on conspiracy and incitement.

The proposals aim to catch and punish those who organise sex tours or who encourage those who travel abroad for the purpose of sexually exploiting children.

These depraved people will face the same tough penalties as they would face if they had committed these offences here.

We are looking for a suitable legislative opportunity to take this forward."

The opportunity is here today. The House supports the Bill, and so do I.

11.54 pm

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle–under–Lyme): I want briefly to say how strongly I support the Bill and all measures to protect children the world over.

The Bill was intended as a small step in dealing with this growing trade in human misery. Since it started its passage through the House, however—because of the strength of feeling and commitment of many organisations and individuals and, indeed, the determination of hon. Members and those in another place—it has been obvious that we need to convince the Government that small steps will not do. We need larger steps.

More and more Governments are implementing legislation to catch and prosecute those perverted individuals. For example, in Thailand, which has been an area of great child prostitution and abuse of children, the Thai Government are moving in the right direction. The changes there should help and support the implementation of the Bill and should help other Governments to eradicate child prostitution.

Three years ago, the former Prime Minister of Thailand declared that the priority policy of his Government was to eliminate child sexual abuse, child prostitution and forced prostitution. That policy was reconfirmed by the present Government. Their strong, clear policy has yielded many good results.

Brothels and entertainment places that provide children under 18 years old for commercial sex have been raided, and a number of people charged. A special task force has been set up to suppress commercial sex business, child sexual abuse and prostitution. A child's rights protection division has been established within the office of the Attorney-General to help child victims and to monitor child sexual abuse cases. All those measures should help with the implementation of the Bill, and the Thai Government are introducing more legislation and employing more people to control that evil trade.

The Thai Government have introduced a penal code under which rape or molestation committed against a child who is not over 15 years of age, even with the child's consent, is statutory rape or molestation, and the perpetrator shall be separately punished for each act committed. That strengthens the law in Thailand, and enables police there to inform the Government here what is going on.

The penal code also stipulates that whoever has sexual intercourse with a girl who is not over 15 years of age, with or without her consent, shall be punished with imprisonment of four to 20 years. If the victimised girl is under 13, the sentence is imprisonment of seven to 20 years. It also stipulates that whoever commits an indecent act on a child—boy or girl—who is not over 15 years of age, with or without his or her consent, will be punished by imprisonment not exceeding 10 years.

The penal code has many other provisions. For example, if the procurer forces a girl to have sex with another, he or she is liable to be imprisoned for between 10 and 20 years. That will help bring this evil trade to an end.

I am sure that we will strongly support the Thai Government in what they are doing. Another important thing they have done is make it easier for children to give evidence. They are proceeding with video evidence and are assisting child witnesses. I think that they must have read the Piggott committee's report on the giving of evidence by children, because they are introducing many of its recommendations.

The Bill has focused the Government's attention on the need for legislation. I thank the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) for introducing it, and for doing all he has done to help rid the world of this problem.

Mr. Alison: I echo the words of the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on taking on this prickly and, in many ways, disagreeable subject, plunging into the ramifications of the sphere with which we are dealing, nursing it through its gestation period in Committee and birth by Third Reading, and generally allowing himself to be exposed to the cold and hot winds of passion that blow from every quarter of the country and the House on him for sponsoring the Bill and seeing it safely on to the statute book.

I am sure that he and his constituents will be proud that his name will be associated—among a dazzling array of other initiatives and achievements that he has secured in the House—with this most necessary and desirable measure for the protection of people who are most vulnerable and unprotected.

One must also endorse and commend the Home Office and my right hon. Friend the Minister for his assiduousness in supporting and helping us to make the best of this measure in Committee. It is very much a sign of the Government's awareness of the strong case that could be made for the very vexed extra-territoriality argument that they have encouraged and assisted in the production of this measure, precisely because they are so anxious that everything possible should be done to help, even if they have reservations about some of the practical matters. I should be among the first to commend my right hon. Friend for the way in which he has helped us in Committee and for the positive attitude he has taken on the matter of his review of extra-territoriality.

As my right hon. Friend the Minister is so open-minded and open-hearted, and has such an open personality that he finds it impossible—none of us finds it easy—to discern the slightest hint or suggestion of duplicity or of misleading anyone, because of his fundamental attitudes on these matters, I detect that he is really not a great enthusiast, prima facie, for the idea of extra-territoriality, unlike his right hon. Friend the Minister of State in another place, for example, who is quite an enthusiast in that sphere. I very much hope that my right hon. Friend will continue to keep a thoroughly and genuinely open mind on this issue; I know that he is capable of it.

We often discover that lifeboats on liners sail round the world for many years without the canvas being stripped off them and attempts being made to launch them. That is not an argument for not having lifeboats on a liner. I very much hope and believe that, if there is even the slightest chance of the efficacy of extra-territoriality being available and applied in this sphere, the fail-safe approach will be to put the lifeboats on the liner.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), who has guided our thoughts on this Bill from the Opposition Front Bench, and who has been so constructive about the approach to extra-territoriality in Committee and again today. I very much hope that the Minister will have discerned the extremely positive approach that Opposition Front Benchers are taking to extra-territoriality, and their insistence that that issue be debated further when we come to consider the Minister's review.

I conclude by expressing my thanks and the thanks of many colleagues in both places—not least the thanks of the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme—for the huge amount of helpful work, research and support that has emanated from the Coalition on Child Prostitution and Tourism. The coalition is composed of Anti-Slavery International, the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development, Christian Aid, the Jubilee Campaign, the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, Save the Children (UK) and World Vision UK. That is a powerful coalition. Anne Badger, who co-ordinated it and supplied us with so much good material, and has sent in the coalition's evidence to the review on extra-territoriality, has done a superb job.

We are greatly in the coalition's debt; it is precisely the sort of body that is being active as non-governmental organisations in overseas countries. They are likely to be well placed to provide evidence of offences committed overseas in any court cases that may, in the end, materialise here.

I conclude by commending all those who have helped us so much, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South for the initiative he has taken.

12.4 pm

Mr. Garnier: As I said earlier this morning, I feel somewhat of an interloper in the debate, since I was not on the Committee where so many constructive suggestions were made as to the progress and content of the Bill.

I echo what has been said before—not because it is customary to do so, but because it is right that I should do so—by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on his good fortune and the exemplary way in which he has brought forward the Bill for presentation.

It is one of the best Friday Bills that I have had the pleasure of reading, because it commands the support of all sides of the House, is tightly drafted and is designed for the specific aim—I have no doubt that it will achieve it—of preventing conspiracies and incitement to do unattractive and revolting acts in foreign countries that no moral person could possibly condone.

By keeping my remarks as brief as I can, I do not wish to be thought merely to be giving cursory praise to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South, who has performed a signal task. The House, the country and, as right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) has already said, his constituents, will remember that for a good many years to come.

I should like to concentrate on some aspects of the Bill, bearing in mind that this is its Third Reading, which strike me as of particular importance. In clause 1, the ingredients of the conspiracy to commit certain sexual acts outside the United Kingdom are set out.

There is a great mystique about conspiracy. It is often thought—I suspect by laymen and others—that there is something terribly magical about a conspiracy, but it is no more than an agreement between two or more persons to effect an unlawful purpose. The crime is in the agreement. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South and my right hon. Friend the Minister would agree that it is often difficult to get the evidence to prove the conspiracy, but the concept and definition of criminal conspiracy is remarkably simple.

That is just one of the reasons why I find the Bill so attractive. The definition is set out in such simple terms that every person who might be considering breaching its terms in the future will be in no doubt that that is what he is doing.

The conditions set out in the subsections to clause 1 are essential. One of the most essential, which I find so useful, is that in clause 1(3):

"The second condition is that that act or other event constitutes an offence under the law in force in that country or territory."

To some extent, that deals with the implied suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), who spoke with great fluency and cogency, that we were imposing some legislative colonialism on other countries. The double criminality key acquits us of that offence.

There is no need for small children, the innocent victims of such offences, to be brought, at great peril and in fear, from their own lands to this country to go through the ordeal of having to give evidence in a Crown court, because the conspiracy or the incitement will be committed here. It may be that the eventual consequences of the conspiracies and the incitements will be abroad, but because the conspiracy and therefore the crimes that my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South so rightly wishes to stop takes place in this country—or at least elements of them take place in this country—there will be no need for the children to come to this country.

From my personal experience of the civil side of the law, I know that it is not always a good idea to introduce minors, those of tender age, into court because it leads to all sorts of unforeseen consequences, not only with regard to the progress of the trial but also with regard to the future lives of the children.

Mr. Alison: As a layman, I am following the trail that my right hon. and learned Friend has suddenly opened up to me—it seems to be absolutely fascinating. Is he advising us that any offence connected with or committed by a British citizen against a child in another country, such as sexual abuse, automatically implies that a conspiracy must have taken place, and that therefore the case is automatically susceptible to the provisions of the Bill? If that is the case, we have no problems about extra-territorial legislation.

Mr. Garnier: I am not sure that that is the case, because, clearly, there will be cases in which a British subject independently buys himself an airline ticket, goes to another country without conspiring with or being incited by anyone, and commits an act that would be considered a sexual offence against a minor if committed in this country. It may also be an offence to commit that act in the other country—for example, in Thailand. However, under the present law the fact that he commits the act in Thailand, is not prosecuted for it in Thailand and returns here does not make him guilty of an offence that would be brought within the terms of the Bill. If he conspires with or incites others while in England to do such things abroad, he will be caught by the Bill.

I hope that I am correct in saying that this is a limited Bill that attempts to create discrete crimes that can be dealt with positively. It fills a hole that needed to be filled. The Bill does not require under-age children to be brought to England to justify the prosecution. It seems to me a safeguard if people were worried that children would be brought back here to go through the ordeal of giving evidence in the United Kingdom courts. That is not a worry if the offences are committed under the Bill. That is of great assistance to us all.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet made the point that the primary responsibility for stopping this sort of misconduct does not lie only with this country. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) gave us some examples of how Thailand is doing a great deal to fulfil its responsibilities, both to its own nationals and internationally. It is tightening its laws on this subject. However, I fear that that may be an isolated example—though I hope that I am wrong.

I hope that, when the Bill gets publicity in the international press—as it surely will—it will encourage other Governments to introduce measures to clamp down on sexual misconduct with children and other vulnerable people in their own states. Hon. Members will then be able to feel that they have done a service in passing the Bill on to the statute book, and that other countries will take up the battle cry and introduce their own legislation to ensure that they play their part.

A minor point concerned me relating to clause 1(3)—the double criminality point—which ties in with the point that I made in response to the hon. Member for

Newcastle–under–Lyme. There may be some offences that are on the statute books of another country but that are never prosecuted.

I have a fear that some defence legal teams will say that, because the offences that we find abhorrent in this country are not rigorously prosecuted in other countries, it will be contrary to public policy, and the Crown Prosecution Service should be discouraged from bringing prosecutions. They may say: if the offences are never brought to book in another country, why should we penalise a potential defendant in this country? Several hon. Members have read out the available punishments for committing serious sexual offences in this country; perhaps the courts abroad are not so willing or so ready to impose the severest penalties.

I choose a ludicrous example to make the point, but let us assume that, in a foreign country, the maximum penalty for committing unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 is life imprisonment, but that, on the rare occasion that an offender is brought to a court and a conviction made, the offender is given a conditional—even absolute—discharge. I trust that our courts and systems in this country will not allow that to be taken into account in deciding the merit of a policy of prosecution.

If the offence abroad is a bad thing of itself, it must be prosecuted with rigour if it is conspired towards or incited towards in this country, and we should not allow other people's—perhaps less rigorous—views on the law of penalties to affect our decision-making process.

Mrs. Golding: Other countries have had the problems with young children giving evidence that we have experienced. That is why Thailand is making proposals to enable young children to give evidence in court more easily—we have already made progress with that in this country. As other countries realise that laws can be put in force, prosecutions may increase.

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for that helpful intervention.

I have briefly discussed the conspiracy aspect of the Bill. I shall now briefly discuss clause 2—the incitement aspect. I must remind myself, if not others, that we are talking about the commission not of the substantive offences but, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) rightly reminded us, of inchoate offences—conspiracy and incitement.

Incitement is not a difficult word; it is the encouragement of others to commit a crime. It is the step before the conspiracy. The person incited may be party to the conspiracy with the person inciting. The clause, and the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South, does not mean that innocent children from abroad need to come to this country to give evidence to support the prosecution of those who commit such offences in this country.

In addition to the general thrust of the Bill, what I like about the incitement clauses and the parts thereunder—I am looking now especially at clause 3—is the need for a joining of issues, presumably on paper, before the trial begins.

Clause 3(2) provides:

"Subject to subsection (3), a condition in section 1(3) or 2(1)(c) is to be taken to be satisfied unless, not later than rules of court may provide, the defence serve on the prosecution a notice"— and then there is a list of things that a defence must include in the notice.

Some people may consider that that reverses the burden of proof and imposes on the defendant a burden that he would not otherwise face under our criminal law, but that interpretation would be wrong. All the clause does—it is a good example of the new policy in criminal trials, which has been in existence in civil actions for years—is bring before the judge, at the earliest possible stage, a joining of issues, so that time is not wasted in a court exploring matters that need not be explored.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South on introducing the clause, because it will sensibly reduce the time that is often wasted on making investigations to produce evidence to go into issues that will not be at issue at trial. It will save time and money, and many people prosecuted under the legislation will be entitled to legal aid—although, if they have been on expensive holidays abroad, perhaps they will not. But much public money will be saved. That issue may not have occurred to people before, but clause 3 addresses it, for which I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South.

I shall ask my right hon. Friend the Minister one question before I finish—I apologise for speaking for longer than I intended. Clause 3(4) states:

"The court, if it thinks fit, may permit the defence to require the prosecution to show that the condition is satisfied without prior service of a notice under subsection (2)."

I assume that that applies where the defendant has not complied with subsection (2), there has been no joining of issues on paper and the court may, of its own motion, allow a defendant to require the prosecution to show that the condition is satisfied.

What are the ground rules for allowing the court to think it fit? Perhaps either my right hon. Friend the Minister or my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South will respond to that question, if not immediately, perhaps in writing later.

I have spoken with sincere warmth about the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South, and I hope that I can, unusually, extend that warmth to the hon. Member for Newcastle–under–Lyme (Mrs. Golding), who was a member of the Committee and clearly did a good job—if I may say so without sounding patronising. I congratulate and thank hon. Members who have contributed to the debate today, who have helped to make this one of the best Bills that this Parliament will have passed.

Mr. Jenkin: I join the many voices in the Chamber in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on introducing the Bill. I have come here this morning in response to the steady flow of representations that I have received from constituents from all walks of life and to the pressure that has been exerted by organisations mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison). I have also come in response to my own conscience on the horrors of the offences that we are discussing. It has not been a particularly enjoyable morning in the House of Commons, but, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) explained, it has perhaps been one of the most useful Friday mornings that we have spent in the House for some time, at least since the Bill's Second Reading. I congratulate the Committee on doing a good job.

I support the Bill and wish to express my constituents' support for it. But I also wish to express my constituents' anxieties about the continuing perceived shortcomings of the Bill. The amendments that we discussed earlier this morning were a further attempt to deal with the Bill's perceived shortcomings arising from the issue of extra-territoriality. The importance that people attach to the ability of British law to deal with offences in other countries should not be underestimated. The House should not underestimate the mystification that people express at the fact that the House and Parliament are unable to frame effective legislation in order to prosecute people who they believe have committed heinous offences.

Everyone in the House believes that those people have committed heinous offences, and we present ourselves as a sovereign Parliament. The public are therefore mystified as to why it is impossible to frame legislation to prosecute people for offences for which they should be prosecuted. In many countries where British citizens commit offences, systems of law and order, accountability and public administration are wanting—which is why such offences are committed there. Although there is legislation criminalising sex with minors in Thailand, for example, we know that there are few prosecutions for those offences. Constituents must be confident that Parliament is doing its job and implementing much-needed laws. I am concerned that in this Bill we are failing in that task.

I listened carefully to the explanation given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State as to why particular clauses that would apply British law to offences committed outside the United Kingdom cannot appear in the Bill. I listened also to the debate between my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough about the issue.

However, the vast majority of British people will be rather unsympathetic when faced with technical explanations—however satisfactory they may be for lawyers. It is impossible to explain to a layman why a sovereign parliament cannot decide whom it shall prosecute and for what offences, and then introduce laws to conduct that prosecution. Perhaps we need different criminal legislation in this country. It may be that our existing criminal court system and our conventions of criminal evidence, criminal prosecutions and our common law history are inadequate to the task.

Perhaps Parliament should establish a new court with special rules of evidence, special procedures and a special judge to deal with offences that are committed extra-territorially. Perhaps that system should be constructed in isolation from the common law which pervades our criminal justice system. We may have to create a different branch of law through primary legislation to deal with the problem. If the powers that be retreat into technical argument and cower behind the reasoning offered by eminent Queen's Counsels or well-advised Ministers, it creates a lingering sense of unease that we are not doing our job properly.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend seems to suggest that British courts should have extra-territorial jurisdiction in this and in other matters. Would he be content for courts in other countries—I refer particularly to the European Court or something of that nature—to have similar powers here? I know that my hon. Friend is interested in such matters.

Mr. Jenkin: As we know from the Swedish experience, courts in other countries have extra-territorial jurisdiction. If British nationals who had committed offences returned to certain countries, they could be prosecuted by the courts there. The comparison with the European Court of Justice is not a serious one. Parliament has given that court jurisdiction, through primary legislation, over the domestic law of the land. I do not suggest that we should persuade Thailand to grant jurisdiction to United Kingdom courts over Thai domestic law—that would mean granting powers equivalent to that of the European Court of Justice.

As it is difficult to adapt the existing system of criminal law prosecution in this country to deal with the new types of offences that are promoted across the world by new technology and in which vast numbers of people may engage through the cheapness of long-haul international travel, we can no longer be satisfied with the system that has developed without taking account of such considerations. If Parliament does not have the power and the imagination to adapt the British legal system to the present circumstances of widespread foreign travel and high technology, we shall cease to be the relevant institution that we should be in the minds of our constituents. I should like to leave that thought with the House this morning.

The Bill is a worthwhile measure. My right hon. Friend the Minister's explanations on the limitation of extra-territoriality were well put and I shall explain them to my constituents. I shall cut out the columns of Hansard and send them to those who have lobbied me about the Bill.

Mr. Michael: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman shares the concerns that have been expressed by others, but does he accept that the length at which he is pursuing a point that has been dealt with in detail in Committee is beginning to raise the thought that perhaps Conservative Members wish to draw out the debate to avoid what will obviously be an embarrassing debate for the Conservative party on the sources of money for their general election fund, especially from abroad?

Mr. Jenkin: I shall treat that intervention with the contempt that it deserves. I was completing my remarks.

I welcome the Bill and I shall convey to my constituents the explanations that my right hon. Friend has given. However, I shall leave that thought with the House about the future scope of the legislation, as we shall be dealing not only with these offences, but with many others which, in the international world and the global village in which we now live, may require laws with extra-territorial jurisdiction so that we can prosecute people who come to Britain having committed offences abroad.

Mr. Congdon: The House and the country have a good tradition dealing with the difficult issue of child abuse. I was interested to read that in 1994 there were more than 2,200 successful prosecutions in Britain for the vile practice of child abuse. That is why it is even more important for the House to give the Bill a Third Reading so that it can proceed to the other place.

It would be quite wrong to have strong laws in Britain dealing with child abuse without there being any measures to prevent those people who have been inhibited by those laws from avoiding them by going abroad to indulge in perverted practices.

In reading the debates on the Bill on Second Reading and in Committee, I was interested to learn about the scale of child prostitution, in so far as it can be measured. The figures quoted were that there are 200,000 child prostitutes in Thailand and 60,000 in the Philippines. An appalling number of children's lives are ruined by the foul and awful trade in child prostitution. That is why it was right for my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) to introduce this important Bill.

Many of my constituents have written to me on the matter and the correspondence goes back some considerable time. I must confess that about a year ago I felt that we were making good progress. The right noises were coming from Home Office Ministers and I welcomed the proposal from my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South. I thought that it was great that we were putting measures on the statute book to deal with the trade in child prostitution.

As I said earlier, I was then somewhat mortified to get a lot of letters and postcards from constituents asking, "Why is it that you as Members of Parliament are sitting back and doing nothing about this foul, vile trade?" I was surprised when my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) said that the postcards he had received had no addresses on them. It may be that people in Croydon are more literate or more open than people in Romford—I do not know—but I certainly had a fair number of letters from people who gave their names and addresses.

My right hon. Friend the Minister's response was excellent. It set out clearly the Government's views, which we all share, about this foul trade and about the need to do something about it. That is why I welcome the Bill.

I share the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) that the Bill does not go far enough in terms of extra-territoriality. He was absolutely right to elaborate on that point. It was a pity that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) intervened as he did. There is no doubt that people look to this House to pass legislation on crimes that they find abhorrent, and they want us to take further action. Having listened carefully this morning to the explanation of why the Bill does not go further, I understand the point.

The House has a tradition of passing legislation that is not just about bringing prosecutions, but about changing behaviour. The law that is always cited in that respect is the Race Relations Act 1976. There are other laws, some of which hon. Members have cited this morning, which make certain offences illegal. If one asks in a parliamentary question how many people have been prosecuted under that law and how many people have gone to prison, the number may be derisory. In a way, that does not matter because the important point is whether the law succeeds in changing practice—yes or no. I believe strongly that, regardless of the argument that it would be difficult to bring a prosecution against someone for committing such acts abroad, it would have been right extend the Bill in that way.

I now turn to what the Bill tries to do. In a sense, the same point about the difficulties of bringing prosecutions could be made about the Bill as it stands. I do not say this to criticise the Bill. It can be difficult to prove conspiracies and it can be difficult to provide the necessary evidence. However, I believe that the very fact of the Bill's getting on to the statute book will send a firm message to those thinking of going to countries such as Thailand to engage in perverted practices that it is just be possible that they or the people who are putting out advertisements will be prosecuted. That is likely to lead to a reduction in such offences.

I resisted intervening in the debate on amendment No. 1, which covered sending and receiving messages on the Internet. I had more doubts before I listened to the debate. I now feel that the amendment is likely to be workable. I suspect that the sending is far easier to prove than the receiving, but I presume that it would be possible for anyone, whether a policeman or someone else, to prove that a message can be received by logging on to the Internet and receiving it. It may be far easier to get proof in terms of the Internet than it would be in terms of telephone messages, which just disappear unless one has one of those infernal answering machines and even then the messages can be recorded over.

Although there may be difficulties in obtaining prosecutions under the legislation, the very fact that the House will pass the Bill will change behaviour, and we all wish to see that happen. I will continue to respond to my constituents and tell them that I am confident that the House of Commons is doing what it can to deal with that vile practice and trade.

I hope that, at a later date, Ministers—or perhaps another private Member—will feel that they can introduce an extension to the Bill along the lines that I have indicated. I am pleased to add my support to the Bill on Third Reading and I look forward to seeing it on the statute book shortly.

Lady Olga Maitland: I add my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). His adoption of the Bill was typical of him, because he has never ducked difficult issues. I have always known him to be a courageous man with a strong social conscience. When we became aware that the subject needed tackling, I knew that we needed someone who is not squeamish, because it takes guts to go into the seamier side of life and not quail. I also admire my hon. Friend for pulling together a committed team, because, by working as a united force and doing its own research, that team has made the Bill so workable and worth while.

I find it very difficult to accept that people can be so utterly degraded and so disgusting as even to contemplate the sexual abuse of children that we have heard about. I am appalled that such people seem to have no sense of shame and no conscience about the damage that they must be doing or have done to defenceless children, boys and girls. When young people are abused in that way, they are damaged for life. There is no turning back. Their prison sentence has started once they have been assaulted for mere sexual gratification, and they do not stand a chance.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) pointed out on Second Reading—unfortunately, I was not in the Chamber for his speech, but I read it and thought he made his point powerfully—the children involved are often orphans. They are desperate, hungry, illiterate and probably far from home and have often been duped into taking drugs to make them more malleable. The thought makes me shake with horror.

The situation is made all the worse by the fact that the people who take advantage of the children are those who have had every opportunity that the first world has to offer. They are mostly prosperous business men, professional people and people from all walks of life. They are not simple illiterates who do not know any better—they do, and that makes the Bill all the more important.

The Bill deals with the important and core point: if people do not conspire and encourage others to commit such acts, it is less likely that the offences will happen on the scale that they do. Therefore, tackling conspiracy and incitement is a vital aspect of the Bill. I regard with wry humour the bottom of the first page of the Bill which states:

"The Bill will have no effect on costs to businesses."

My goodness, I hope it does. I hope that it runs out of business every little trade that sends people abroad to commit those acts. I hope that they all end up thoroughly bankrupt.

We must consider the scale of the sexual exploitation which has been mentioned in the House already. The 1995 Christian Aid report, entitled "An Abuse of Innocence", estimated that the numbers of children in prostitution in Thailand approached 250,000, and there are growing numbers in Colombia, Sri Lanka, Kenya, India, Vietnam and Cambodia. To my mind, there is no burning hell that is sufficient punishment for the people who prey on those children.

Earlier, hon. Members were anguishing about extra-territorial jurisdiction. We cannot duck that in the long term. When British nationals overseas act in the ways described, it is our moral responsibility to bring them to justice. If we need to bring laws into being to deal with that, we must do so.

I am disappointed that we are serving ourselves only half a loaf today, but we do so in the expectation that it will become the whole. Unless we tackle the issue with genuine energy, we will let down both ourselves and the aims of the Bill. Indeed, it would be a gross neglect of duty.

I accept that the Bill now goes a little further than intended because of the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South dealing with the means of messages being sent to or received from overseas. At least that is a step forward. However, it is simply not good enough to say that the problems of extra-territorial jurisdiction are too legally tortuous to tackle and may be beyond us—and that even if we did give the courts such jurisdiction, it would be a token gesture; in short, worthless. I do not take that view. My view is that the offences are so deeply offensive and terrible that we are under a moral obligation to do all that we can to surmount the difficulties. Somehow, we must.

I accept that my right hon. Friend the Minister is concerned about the matter. He made a moving speech on this real problem when he addressed the Michael Sieff Foundation's conference "Child Sex Tourism—The Need For An Urgent UK Response". I welcome the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has instigated a review of our policy on this matter. It is right to examine whether the arguments that underpin the territorial nature of our jurisdiction should remain valid or whether we should go further.

We must take into account the changing circumstances regarding evidence. For example, some perverts return with videos of their sick activities abroad. Surely we could convict them on that evidence alone, rather than prosecute for the lesser offence of possession of child pornography. By taking a lateral thinking approach to the problems, the review body, when it comes into being, will be able to reach a positive conclusion on how to proceed. Its time will have been well spent.

What worries me is that, meanwhile, we have a long way to go. Perhaps we should examine what other countries are doing. Twelve have now passed extra-territorial laws allowing them to prosecute nationals engaged in sex offences in other countries. Those countries are: Australia, Belgium, France, Germany, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, the United States of America, Iceland, Denmark, Finland and Switzerland. I welcome the fact that the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) will be addressing a conference on this subject in Strasbourg next week. I hope that he will raise the whole issue of extra-territorial jurisdiction. I also hope that he will learn lessons from other countries and bring them home with him. I wonder why we cannot summon up all our resources and do the same as those other countries.

Another matter astonishes me. Surely we could seek out the evidence overseas ourselves, perhaps through Interpol or with the help of the National Criminal Intelligence Service. My right hon. Friend the Minister referred to the NCIS paedophile unit, which is very experienced. I do not understand why it cannot be asked specifically to take on research into these offences. I understand that the unit has already chased across the world on other paedophile matters, so its experience could be brought to good account.

We could seek bilateral arrangements with the police forces of other countries to help us to investigate crimes, gather evidence and get together the forensic materials. Most of the countries that we are concerned about have laws outlawing sexual trade, even if they are rather lax about doing anything about it.

When Lord Hylton introduced his own Sexual Offences (Amendment) Bill in the other place in February, he pointed out that police liaison officers had been sent from this country to overseas locations in respect of drugs offences. Why not then in relation to sexual offences? Is not a child abused every bit as serious as a drug offence? Does not a child come before drugs? Do not human beings come before drugs? I accept that drugs can have an appalling effect on human beings in other ways, but none the less we are talking about young, innocent people, and they have rights that we should put to the top of the agenda.

May I put a more positive light on the Bill? It may not be perfect. In many aspects, it leaves much to be desired, but it is better to get such a Bill on the statute book and get on with it rather than not act at all. At least it will be possible to make amendments at a later stage. That would certainly pass a clear signal that this society would no longer tolerate such behaviour.

[Lady Olga Maitland]

When he launched his review of sex tourism, my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary declared:

"the full force of the law must be used against the evil people who sexually exploit children for money. It is an abhorrent activity. We must do all we can to prevent it and protect children everywhere."

The Government have always placed high value on children, and their safety and well-being, so I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will not rest until he has stiffened up the Bill much further.

Lastly, a word for the countries where the child sex trade persists. I trust that talks are taking place at the highest level between our respective Governments to work together to curb this trade. There is evidence that, while it may be forbidden, the authorities turn a blind eye. A country can be regarded as truly civilised only if it guards and protects innocent young children with the same dedication as we do here. Authorities the world over must be pressed to close down their child brothels and prosecute.

Mr. Michael: Does the hon. Lady agree that support for the 10th item on the Order Paper today, the Sexual Offences Against Children (Register of Offenders) Bill, would be a measure of the interest and civilisation of Members of the House, and that we should move forward on the Bill in order to debate not only that Bill but the Bill which seeks to regulate international contributions to the finances of the Conservative party and other Bills which are waiting their place for debate?

Lady Olga Maitland: I am disappointed by the hon. Gentleman's intervention. He brings a political dimension to an important issue, on which I thought that we shared genuine sympathy and concern.

Mr. Michael: We do, but I also share concern that the debate is being dragged out to avoid reaching the next Bill. There are some good points.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. This is becoming tedious repetition now.

Lady Olga Maitland: I shall conclude, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Everyone here today is likely to be a parent or to have close young relatives. Many of us have brought children into the world. We bring them up, we nurture them, we are aware of their gentle innocence. It is understandably revolting even to contemplate any violence against them. A twisted pervert who plans for months his vile sexual programme and goes overseas in search of it deserves the full weight of the law. A life sentence is the only penalty that I could accept. It is hard to show mercy for a man who has committed such offences.

After all, such a man has condemned one child or perhaps many children to a living death. They could end up committing suicide through desperation or dying from infections such as AIDS. Why should that man enjoy the freedom to go out and commit further offences and leave the innocent to suffer for ever? I trust that the courts will not falter in following public opinion and imposing the appropriate penalties. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South on introducing the Bill. It is vastly overdue, and all the more important for it. I wish it speedy progress to Royal Assent.

Sir Michael Neubert: As a sponsor of the Bill, a supporter on Second Reading, a member of the Committee that considered it and a participant in this morning's debate on Report, probably have no need to reaffirm my detestation of that most detestable of practices, the sexual abuse of children. Now that I am on my feet, I pay tribute again to the author of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who has done the House and children a service by introducing it. I hope that it will shortly be given a Third Reading and pass to another place.

I rise briefly because we all recognise that no individual Member of Parliament has the resources or capacity to introduce such a measure without considerable support and research backing from organisations outside—perhaps even a Department of State. My thanks should be put on record to the Action for Children Campaign and especially to its director, Rev. Graham St. John-Willey. It has been active in the matter for six years, not just the six months since the Bill's introduction. Today marks some advance for its desire to bring this most disreputable of trades to an end, so far as we can achieve that by the Bill.

The Action for Children Campaign represents a large coalition of national organisations—principally, the National Council of Women of Great Britain. Altogether, more than 100 leading women's organisations and many others in churches, synagogues, schools, colleges, universities and youth organisations, have supported its programme. It must be gratifying for them, after all their efforts, that some of their hopes, especially in respect of sex tours, are being realised by what I hope will be the Bill's speedy passage through Parliament. I renew my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South and wish the Bill well.

Mr. Michael: I again congratulate the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who has done a service to the House and the public in bringing the Bill forward. That service has been limited by the limited nature of the Bill that was handed to him by the Government Whips Office; that has been reflected in the contributions of hon. Members on both sides of the House in Committee and on Report. Nevertheless, the Bill is an important stage in tackling this terrible problem.

The Bill is a good deal stronger because of the amendments agreed by us today than it was when it entered the House or when it came back from Committee. The amendments have made it a significant step in dealing with an international scandal and with the outrage of everybody in Britain at the actions of citizens of the United Kingdom who participate in and encourage the activities that it is intended to tackle. I am pleased that the Minister picked up the points that were made in Committee and supported the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Hendon, South today.

Tough words from the Home Secretary or from the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) are meaningless and of no value to the victims of paedophiles unless we have clear and effective law backed by action. The contributions of some Conservative Members have been weighty and serious. However, although the contributions of the hon. Members for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) and for Welwyn Hatfield and others may have been impelled by concerns expressed by their constituents, they were also impelled by the wish of the Government Whips Office to avoid discussion of the funding from abroad of the Conservative party, which is the matter that will be debated once this Bill has passed on its way.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) and for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who have pursued the issue over not weeks but years. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting made the important point that we need to know what is being done on our behalf and in our names in international debates and in terms of international action. He has played a major part in the international debate and in trying to move the issue forward.

In Committee, it was disappointing to hear the Minister of State say that he was content to leave actions abroad by British citizens to the law of those countries and the enthusiasm of the law enforcement agencies there. During those debates, he suggested that extradition and the offer of co-operation by the British Government were enough. I welcome his statement that the British Government would co-operate in the extradition of people who have been involved in such activities abroad and have been accused of them.

I also welcome the comments that the Minister of State made this morning about the activities of the National Criminal Intelligence Service. It is important to hear a Minister telling the House that he welcomes and supports activity to identify and pursue those who commit offences under the Bill and offences overseas. I believe that the Minister has responded to the quality of the debate in Committee and on Report and has increased his interest in the topic, and I welcome that.

The problem with the extradition and punishment or pursuit of offenders by third-world countries is that our citizens have economic power in the poor countries in which the most horrendous exploitation of children takes place. Fear of discouraging tourism by following through the tough action in a way that might inspire headlines in the United Kingdom can be a disincentive. Fear of that sort of response and its effect on the economy might have an impact. Therefore, a stronger voice from Ministers, saying that international action will be encouraged, is important indeed.

The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) was right to say that the Crown Prosecution Service should not be lazy or ineffective in prosecuting offenders under the Bill. I am paraphrasing what he said, but it sounded as though he shared my concern that it will take little to discourage the CPS from making proper use of the Bill. I hope that the message that goes from the House is clear and shows that, in supporting the Bill, we want it to be acted upon.

We need pressure from the Government in wider avenues of activity. I hope that support will be given to item 10 on the order paper, the Sexual Offences against Children (Registers of Offenders) Bill and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) for promoting it; it has much support. If the Government Whip, cowering in a corner, shouts, "Object!", I warn him and Conservative Members that our constituents and theirs will not understand and that their constituents will not forgive an obstruction being placed in the way of that worthwhile legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that debate must be confined to the Bill.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The hon. and learned Member for Harborough referred to enforcement. We need to make it easy for poor countries to take a tough line and to realise that our decision in passing this legislation is an important stage in the British Parliament's declaring its abhorrence of such activities abroad and its intention to do more to curb them.

The Government need to be proactive and to support the activities to which my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting referred. I hope that the Minister of State will take on board the suggestion that there should be some representation at the Strasbourg conference. If Ministers from other countries are attending, there seems to be no reason for us not to be represented—at least by a junior Minister. Perhaps we will send a more senior representative to the Stockholm conference in August. I am not sure whether sending an Under-Secretary of State rather than a Minister of State with the standing of the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), who dealt with the Bill in Committee and on the Floor of the House, will send the right message. I welcome the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has dealt with the Bill today and in Committee. That sort of message needs to be carried to the Strasbourg conference as well.

The right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) referred to the coalition that has campaigned to end child prostitution abroad, and I join in the tribute that he paid to its work in briefing hon. Members.

The right hon. Member for Selby also referred to our support for an urgent debate after the completion of the Home Secretary's review of extra-territoriality. That review must be completed quickly. It must not merely be put into a cupboard in the Home Office but be brought to the House for a speedy debate so that we can examine it. Like the Minister, I, on behalf of the Opposition, do not want to raise unrealistic hopes, but we need to examine the results of the Home Secretary's review of the issues surrounding extra-territoriality and the options of strengthened action through the international community, perhaps by means of international agreements and legislation. We should be debating the Government's actions on extra-territoriality in the context of a determination to find the right way to take action on this abhorrent practice.

In that context, I welcome the Bill, which has the Opposition's support as a small but important first step towards obtaining adequate and tough legislation to deal with this issue.

1.5 pm

Mr. Maclean: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on his excellent handling of the Bill during its passage through the House.

[Mr. Maclean]

United Kingdom law, of course, strictly prohibits the mistreatment of children, and those who commit offences against children in this country rightly face stiff penalties. The Government are committed to doing all they can to deter and punish those who sexually abuse children and to ensuring that, when prosecutions are brought against people who mistreat children, the criminal justice system treats child victims of crime fairly and with sensitivity.

Measures to ensure that the criminal justice process treats children fairly and with sensitivity include such provisions as allowing children to give evidence by closed circuit television, allowing video-recorded interviews of children conducted by the police or social workers to form the child's evidence-in-chief at trial, and allowing committal proceedings in cases in which children are involved to be bypassed so that they do not have to give evidence twice.

The paedophile unit of the National Criminal Intelligence Service maintains a computerised database of people actively involved in paedophilia. The unit collects, develops, analyses and disseminates information and intelligence relating to those people and works closely with police forces across the country. I must say that the unit is one of the best organisations of its type in the world. It may be the only organisation that so vigorously pursues paedophiles.

People who sexually abuse children are liable to be prosecuted for a wide range of offences. The offences include rape, unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 13, unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under 16, buggery with a child under 16, indecent assault, and gross indecency with a child under 14.

The measures in the Bill are a further extension of the powers the Government have taken over the years to combat the menace that perverts pose to innocent children everywhere. The Government cannot and would not deny that, regrettably, a significant number of those perverts who travel to other lands to abuse children are British. It is right, therefore, that the Government should take the matter seriously and consider what measures they can take.

I have received many letters from people expressing their disgust that, in their view, the Government have not acted to take extra-territorial jurisdiction. Like my right hon. and hon. Friends, I share their anger at some of the despicable postcards that were sent to hon. Members on both sides of the House accusing hon. Members of not caring about or being idle in children's defence. Any organisation that sends such postcards, signed or not, should be ashamed of itself.

All hon. Members are concerned about children. No sensible Government, however, should introduce legislation unless they can be certain that it will be effective. Hon. Members on both sides of the House would be among the first to criticise the Government were the legislation to prove ineffective or counter-productive, or if it failed to work. It is because we want to ensure that legislation is workable that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has announced a review of extra-territorial jurisdiction. If we can find a way to ensure that, in the particular circumstances of sex tourism, that jurisdiction would work and could be enforced effectively, we shall, as I have said repeatedly, not be backward in coming forward with legislation to tackle the problem.

I greatly respect the views that my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) holds on this matter. The mere fact that I have set out, perhaps robustly on occasions, the practical difficulties that we would face if we were to take extra-territorial jurisdiction does not mean that I have prejudged the result of the review or, to use his words, that I am unsympathetic to or unenthusiastic about extra-territorial jurisdiction. It is not that, but I do not want the House to run away with itself on a wave of emotion and believe that it is a simple matter of waving a magic wand and producing a couple of clauses in a Bill to achieve that aim easily.

Of course the measures in the Bill are not the entire answer to the problem, but I reject the suggestion that they are just a small step along the way. Although the Bill is extremely important, only effective action by the tourist-receiving countries will make a difference on the ground and make life infinitely better for the millions of children around the world who are being abused—although abuse sounds too light a word for what happens to them.

I am encouraged by some of the steps that have been taken by the Philippines, for example, to crack down on sex tourists. I am puzzled by those who act as apologists for the inaction by tourist-receiving countries when they say that those countries cannot be seen to prosecute western tourists because of the harm that it will do to their tourist trade. Therefore they must pass the buck back to western countries to do something. Of course those countries will attract the scum of the earth if they fail to purge their sleazy child brothels. I suggest that their tourist trade might expand if families and decent people felt able to visit such places, free from the fear either of being thought a pervert or of having to consort with them. My message to those countries is, "Prosecute those scum and see your international standing rise." Soho was cleaned up by taking action there, not by exhorting people in foreign countries not to come to London.

The Bill is, as I said, another helpful weapon in the fight against the perverts. The Government have taken other positive steps. We work hard in international forums, particularly the United Nations General Assembly and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, to combat child prostitution. We supported the adoption in 1992 by the commission of a programme of action for the prevention of the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, and have urged all countries to implement the measures that it contains.

We frequently raise the question of child prostitution in contacts with authorities in countries where that is a problem. As well as being a party to the convention on the rights of the child, we support the work of the committee on the rights of the child in monitoring the compliance of states with the convention.

The Overseas Development Agency provides assistance to several non-governmental organisation projects which involve the rehabilitation of street children and the associated problems of prostitution, drug abuse and violence.

The police service provides assistance to local law enforcement officers in countries where child prostitution is a problem directly and through participation in training sessions at the Interpol standing working party on offences against minors.

The Government whole-heartedly support the valuable participation of the police service in the work of the Interpol standing working party and the contribution of those officers who are working closely with their counterparts in the developing countries. We send politicians—me or my colleagues—to talk at international forums, and important though that may be, why we play a leading role came home to me loud and clear when I hosted a reception a few months for all the paedophile officers of Interpol around the world at the national headquarters of our National Criminal Intelligence Service.

Senior police officers from around the world have made contacts and exchanged business cards. They will not be hampered by diplomacy, protocol or convention, as they now have the telephone numbers of their colleagues in the Philippines, in Tokyo, in Pretoria, in New York and in Washington. They are now liaising and co-operating fully with each other to track down paedophiles. Britain is at the forefront of that process and it is at the centre of the hub through NCIS.

Mr. Michael: Does the Minister accept that what concerns us is not whether Minister talk at conferences but that they should listen, co-operate and, above all, lend their authority to action? That is what my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) and I are asking the Minister to do.

Mr. Maclean: I am slightly at a loss to know what to make of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I have read out a list of areas in the United Nations and in Europe where Britain has been at the forefront in getting these conventions. We not only talk at the convention stage but follow it up in ratifying and getting the measures through. Every time I go to one of these conferences, the first thing I say to other countries is, "Before you start making a new convention for the world, will you please sign up to all the other conventions that you talked about five years ago and did not sign?" I can say that in relation to drugs and extradition, in particular.

Of course the British Government will be represented at the Stockholm conference and at the meeting in Strasbourg next week. Officials from my Department will be there and they will be involved in the planning and preparation stage. A Minister from the Home Office will be present at the conference in Stockholm in August. The British Government will be represented there, and I hope that conclusions will be reached.

I am making the point that the rank of the Minister is not what is essential; what is essential is the follow-up to the conference. This country has a proud record of following up the things to which it signs up and of pursuing them vigorously. We have the finest police force in the world and a team of officers dedicated to tracking down paedophiles and child abusers wherever they raise their ugly heads in the world. We shall continue to combat child prostitution through our work in international bodies and with the British police force hard on their heels.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South on introducing an excellent measure. I hope that he will understand when I say that, by sponsoring the Bill, his name will for ever more be linked with the sexual abuse of children: if his Bill is passed, as I hope and pray it will be, his name will be linked to this evil because, as a result of his efforts, another shield will have been raised to protect children from sexual abuse. My hon. Friend deserves the congratulations and thanks of hon. Members and the whole country for bringing the Bill forward and for his patience and kindness in piloting it through the House.

I also thank the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) for most of what he said, for his support of the Bill and for what he said in his concluding remarks. However, I am sorry that he introduced the bogus point of item 10 on our agenda today, which I shall not address. He knows very well from reading the White Paper produced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department that we promised a consultation document going into detail on registers of paedophiles and a sex register.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth also knows that my right hon. and learned Friend wrote to his hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Ms Anderson) yesterday to explain that it would be nonsense to proceed with precipitate legislation on a sex register which has not been thought out when we have a full consultation document coming out in relation to all aspects of this matter. It is bogus to suggest that any objection to the Bill that may occur today shows that we are not interested in the subject.

Sir Michael Neubert: Is it not even more astonishing that the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) is prepared to see such legislation go through on the nod this afternoon, without any debate at all?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are beginning to stray, even though the Minister said that he would not do so.

Mr. Maclean: I would not want to stray in any circumstances. We have had a good debate this morning. However, more important than whether the House has had a good debate is the fact that we now have an excellent measure that can help to make a difference.

For all the reasons I have given, I am delighted to support the Bill on behalf of the British Government. I look forward to its speedy passage through another place and to its becoming law. I hope that the message goes out from the House today to paedophiles or perverts, wherever they ply their trade in the world, that we have another hammer against them now, and if they try putting their stuff on the Internet we have another chance to get them. Their days are numbered; the message to them is, "Stop it, and stop it now!"

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Regulation of Funding of Political Parties Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.19 pm

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am pleased that the Government have created the opportunity for a fuller discussion of the Bill; after all, leave was given to introduce it by the margin of 163 votes to 62. I am not sure why the Government pulled the rug from under the Pensioners Earnings Bill, which was introduced in 1994, but the change is extremely welcome. I do not know whether the change represents a thawing in the ice age of stone walling by the Government. We hope that they do not try to talk the Bill out and prevent further detailed consideration in Committee of this vital democratic measure.

While paying tribute to those who helped to bring the measure to today's debate, we must pay tribute to the Prime Minister. In January, before I sought leave to introduce the Bill, he put the issue of political funding firmly and squarely on the political agenda. He said:

"We know who pays 50 per cent. of the money that the Labour party gets".—[Official Report, 25 January 1996; Vol. 270, c. 476.]

He was absolutely right. We do know. It is all on the public record. Party accounts make it clear, as do the records of the certification officer for trade unions. Under strict regulations, unions must file their accounts and they are open and on the public record. Indeed, an annual report is published by the certification officer.

It is regrettable that no such transparency applies to Conservative party funding, which is shrouded in mystery and obscurity. A host of secretive companies and organisations, which I shall mention later—some created after the second world war—funnel secret funds into the Tory party. It appears that the Government are keen to keep it that way. It is, to use a phrase that was fairly common in January, a case of saying one thing and doing another.

When I sought leave to introduce the Bill, I referred to its three main aims. An extremely important one, which I shall discuss later, was that of prohibiting foreign donations. Hon. Members will note that there is no specific provision in the Bill to cover that, because we need to consider the fine detail. That is why you will see in the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we have created a mechanism for examining the detail, reporting back and taking the matter further.

First, I shall expand on clause 1, regarding publication of donations. Many people, not only in the House but outside, may find it odd that, although as individual Members of Parliament we rightly have to declare our earnings, the Tory party machinery, which elects very many Members of the House, is able to maintain a wall of silence around the source of its funds. Essentially, the principle—

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam) rose—

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North) rose—

Mr. Spellar: I give way to the hon. Lady.

Lady Olga Maitland: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is no secrecy about the funding of the Conservative party? Seventy per cent. of donations come from our supporters throughout the country from teas, coffee mornings, luncheons, fairs, fêtes and the like. There is nothing secret about that. Any money that comes via a company must be declared in the company accounts, for everyone to see. Where is the secrecy? There is no secrecy. The hon. Gentleman is trying to cast slurs on and make innuendos about the Conservative party.

Mr. Spellar: I suspect that Mr. Asil Nadir must have bought an awful lot of teas and buns with £400,000 to have obtained value for money—unless he was seeking something else.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): The lavender list was secret.

Mr. Spellar: The Whip mentioned secrecy. The reason for those donations from Mr. Nadir was unclear at the time that they were made. Only subsequently, after his other financial troubles and after he had fled the country, did it become clear. Indeed, the reason was so obscure that, when the matter came to court, the accountant for the Conservative party, Mr. Paul Judge, who took an unfortunate legal action against The Guardian at a cost of £300,000, said that, even though it was only two years later, the Conservative party had cleared out the records relating to the donation.

I shall take the hon. Lady's point further. I think that the Bill will help her and the Conservative party to clarify the matter. If the Conservative party had to publish proper accounts and make it clear where money came from, there would be no opportunity for the slurs and smears claimed by the hon. Lady, as the matter would be out in the open.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): My hon. Friend has raised the name of Mr. Nadir, about whom we have not heard very much for the three years since he fled the country overnight. I hope that my hon. Friend will develop the point, because we are entitled to know about such matters. Mr. Nadir met senior members of the Conservative party—chairmen of the party—who, with their close associates, have made it clear that Mr. Nadir was seeking a knighthood and was willing to pay whatever it cost. We know that he paid about £500,000 in the hope of achieving a knighthood.

Mr. Spellar: I thank my hon. Friend. I thought that the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) wanted to intervene, but he seems to have decided not to do so in the face of my robust reply to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland).

The case of Mr. Nadir highlights strongly the sleazy sources of some of the money that goes into the Conservative party. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) rightly mentioned the strong correlation between donations to the Conservative party and the receipt of knighthoods and peerages. Obviously Mr. Nadir believed that his donations were the way to achieve those goals, even though the authorities caught up with him and the Conservative party reneged on its pledges to him—as it reneged on the tax claims that it made to the electorate at the last general election.

Lady Olga Maitland: The hon. Gentleman is not accepting the fact that, yet again, he wrongly interprets events and makes false slurs. There was no question of Asil Nadir being given a knighthood. He may have wished for one, just as some people wish for the blue moon. The Labour party is trying to place an interpretation on events which simply is not right: Mr. Nadir did not get his knighthood.

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Lady has reinforced my point: the Conservatives do not always deliver—Mr. Al Fayed was under the same misapprehension. One can understand how Mr. Nadir may have come by his misapprehension. When we examine donations from companies and major individuals—when they come to light—we discover that there is, to put it at its kindest, an extremely strong correlation between donations and the receipt of knighthoods and peerages for the managing directors, chairmen or board members of the companies involved.

The Bill makes a strong argument for the principle of transparency and the public's right to know the facts and to make an informed judgment. We can have a debate on whether the conclusions are right or justified, but for the debate to be informed, we need information.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has brought up the subject of transparency. He should look to his party. Perhaps he might like to reflect on the comments made by the general secretary of the Labour party, Larry Whitty, who told the Select Committee on Home Affairs that even if regulations requiring disclosure were not introduced, he would recommend that the party's national executive committee should voluntarily disclose larger donations. In the next breath, however, he said that the Labour party had received only 15 donations in excess of £10,000 a year and he confounded everyone by refusing to declare the source of that money. Is that not a case of saying one thing and doing another? It is typical hypocritical cant.

Mr. Spellar: I am grateful for the hon. Lady's support for the Bill. She said that it is desirable for political parties—she gave a different example—to declare the sources of donations to them. That is the correct course of action.

Lady Olga Maitland: The Labour party does not do it.

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Lady, yet again, makes a case—this time from a sedentary position—for legislation to deal with the issue. The Bill refers to the desirability of transparency so that all political parties may make clear the sources of their funding. The electorate can then draw its own conclusions.

We must look not only at the Conservative party, but at some of the shadowy organisations associated with it, such as British United Industrialists and the infamous river companies that were set up after the war to channel money to the Tory party. A new outfit, the City and Industrial Liaison Council, is now in business. Its purpose is to tap into the workings of the City and of industry and it is able to arrange for meetings between potential donors and senior Ministers. Other fund-raising organisations offer invitations to Downing street as part of their attractive packages.

Although the City and Industrial Liaison Council was established as a separate body, its address is 32 Smith square—which I believe is also the address of the offices of the Conservative party. Although the Tories do not own the premises, which they sold some time ago, they have managed to lease them at a very favourable rate. I see that the hon. Member for Colchester, North now wishes to participate in the debate.

Mr. Jenkin: I refrained from intervening a few moments ago as I wanted to see whether my suspicions about the debate would be confirmed. The debate is simply a string of innuendos and slurs assembled in such a way as to create a completely false impression about the way in which politics works within both the Conservative party and the country as a whole. All the Bill's sponsors are Labour Members and it is obvious that it is purely a party political exercise. The majority of people will be mystified as to why the hon. Gentleman believes that there is a secret conspiracy simply because an organisation has the same address as the Conservative party.

Mr. Spellar: I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman is mystified: it is a permanent condition for him—particularly with regard to his party's European policy. The organisation's invitation says that a short opening statement by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be followed by a question-and-answer session. Prospective donors are then invited to remain and meet those present over a drink. Access, influence and donation—these are not smears; they are the facts. That is what is happening and I think that the electorate has a right to know about it. The electorate has the right to make up its mind—perhaps people will accept the hon. Gentleman's charitable explanation of events—based on the facts.

Some of those who make donations are very clear about their motives. Two prominent donors to the Conservative party stated their motives clearly in an article in The Sunday Times last year. They said:

"We consider donations to party funds to be similar to buying a round of drinks. If you want to be welcome at a party or a pub, it is policy and polite to pay your round."

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): The hon. Gentleman asserted that the liaison council that he discovered to be registered at 32 Smith square was a mysterious organisation. How on earth can it be a mysterious organisation if that is its address? He spoke about people meeting Ministers to put forward their points of view. Is he saying that he never meets anyone from the trade unions, which are the largest donors to the Labour party, that he is not impressed or influenced by them or that he does not listen to them?

Mr. Spellar: As the hon. Gentleman was not entirely sure of the name of the organisation to which I referred, perhaps the Bill will assist him as to what is happening in the party of which he is a member. Perhaps long-standing Tory Members would also like to know about the charter movement in their party, to which I shall refer later.

I referred to the fact that potential donors to the Conservative party were invited to meet the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Tories are confusing their role in government with their role as a party.

[Mr. Spellar]

They have fallen deeper into mixing and merging those roles and do not recognise the key difference between the role of a Government and the role of a political party. The Bill will not stop that, but it will ensure that there is transparency in all those operations.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Where are the hon. Members for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), for Paisley, South (Mr. McMaster), for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay), for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane)—the sponsors of the Bill?

Mr. Spellar: The hon. and learned Gentleman is obviously seeking a place in the Whips Office, where he can track down hon. Members. If he had been taking note at the beginning of the debate, he would have noticed that the Bill was due to be further down the list in the order of business but, as a result of Government action—for reasons that I cannot guess—in pulling other legislation, it has moved up the list. We are fortunate to be able to discuss it today, but it was not easy to predict today's debate and hon. Members with considerable constituency duties will have undertaken to look into the problems of their constituents.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Many hon. Members were expecting to take part in a debate on the Prisoners' Earnings Bill, which was on the Order Paper until yesterday, when it was mysteriously removed from the agenda by the hon. Member concerned, no doubt under pressure from the Government Whips Office, which then had to bring in waifs and strays from the corridors to pad out the previous debate and thus delay debate on my hon. Friend's Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. This is the fifth time that the hon. Gentleman has referred to that matter. I drew his attention to that fact earlier and it is now becoming tedious repetition. Obviously the hon. Gentleman did not take note of my previous remarks.

Mr. Deva: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it parliamentary for the hon. Gentleman to describe other hon. Members, including myself, as waifs and strays?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not a description that I have heard before, but I do not deem it to be unparliamentary.

Mr. Garnier: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for an hon. Member unwittingly to mislead the House by suggesting that the Prisoners' Earnings Bill was removed from the Order Paper yesterday when, apparently, it was pulled three weeks ago?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are all sorts of orders and disorders in the House, but nothing this morning has been out of order. If it was, I would not have allowed it to continue.

Mr. Michael rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Spellar.

Mr. Spellar: Apart from helping some Conservative Members who are present, the publication to which I was referring might also be useful to Conservative central office. It might even assist the Prime Minister who, like the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, seems to believe that the sources of Tory funding, as he said in October 1993,

"are all cheese and wine parties up and down the country."—[Official Report, 19 October 1993; Vol. 230, c. 144.]

I should like to enlighten him—it would also help Conservative central office to have second thoughts and be far more discriminating about the origin of its funds and the motivation of some of its donors.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting spelled out at some length the case of Mr. Asil Nadir. If he had been a one-off, isolated case, one could regard the matter as an unfortunate accident, although £400,000 was a considerable sum. But he is by no means alone. Donations were made by Mr. Jack Lyons and by Mr. Gerald Ronson, another person who had to spend some time at Her Majesty's pleasure. There was Mr. Nazmu Virani, who was involved in the Bank of Credit and Commerce International scandal, and there were a number of others who made donations and who were subsequently found to be less than desirable persons.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to refer to the support that his party received from Mr. Robert Maxwell, the greatest robber of all time?

Mr. Spellar: I thank the hon. Lady for her support. That point was made by the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) on a previous occasion when I sought to introduce the Bill. Indeed, I welcome that support for transparency about donations to all political parties.

I think that the creditors of Polly Peck would be pleased if the Conservative party arranged to give back the moneys that it received from Mr. Nadir, because it is doubtful whether the money came from Mr. Nadir or from the company. The creditors would be extremely—

Mr. Garnier: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to refer to matters that are in controversy in a criminal trial? An associate of Mr. Asil Nadir has recently been convicted, but has yet to be sentenced for matters connected with Mr. Asil Nadir. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to give guidance to ensure that the hon. Gentleman does not stray too closely into the details of that case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All hon. Members should avoid matters that are sub judice. I hope that the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) will do so.

Mr. Spellar: Obviously I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I do not think that these moneys are the subject of the court case. It is interesting that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) does not wish those matters to be discussed.

Mr. Garnier: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Warley, West is misconducting himself. He attributed motives to me in a wholly unworthy way. I have no ulterior motive in drawing to your attention the need for care when we are talking about current criminal cases.

Lady Olga Maitland: My hon. and learned Friend is a QC.

Mr. Garnier: I will ignore that point. If the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) wishes to make personal remarks, he should confine himself to doing so outside the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thought that I had made that point a moment ago. What we shall now do is get on with the debate.

Mr. Spellar: The Conservative party might be concerned not just about the identities of those who are making the donations but about their motives. Conservative Members might be concerned that the public and some of us here will put two and two together. Earlier, we discussed knighthoods and peerages. The record of appointments to quangos over a number of years—I refer not only to company officers but to their relatives—shows strong links between donations to the Conservative party and appointments to quangos. One sees the creation of a Conservative client state.

Mr. Deva: I am trying to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman. He made the good point that he was worried that people who were in business or in the City had been invited to places such as Downing street and the Department of Trade and Industry to have their opinions heard and perhaps to have a cup of coffee or tea with a Minister. That has caused the hon. Gentleman great concern; I understand where he is coming from. Am I therefore to believe that if, God forbid, a Labour Government ever came to power, no trade unionist would ever be allowed to go into Downing street and that no trade unionist would ever be allowed to go into the Department for Education and Employment? Am I to believe that there would be no beer and sandwiches in smoke-filled rooms?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That must be the last of the long interventions. Interventions are supposed to be brief and to the point.

Mr. Spellar: The hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) has missed the point of the measure, which is to create transparency, as I said at the outset. I am sorry to have to repeat that point, but it is worth while if the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam has not taken it on board. The public will draw their conclusions from the facts and arguments by political parties, but the public should do that on the basis of knowledge.

As I mentioned earlier, donations from trades unions are properly recorded under the law. The Bill would ensure that other donations to political parties were made public. That is not exceptional in other democracies, and most democracies have a requirement for the publication of donations and, in many cases, registration of donations and computer print-outs to ensure that the public are making an informed choice. That is the key issue.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will the hon. Gentleman tell us about the price tag that the trade unions have over their political bosses? Trade unions buy power over the Labour party. They buy 33 per cent. of the votes in Labour's leadership election and candidate selection and 70 per cent. of the votes at Labour's party conference. Frankly, that is a bribe.

Mr. Spellar: I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cox: I am sure that my hon. Friend will adequately respond to point made by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland). In 1992, when my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) was the Labour shadow spokesman on employment, he asked many questions about the visits of Ministers to Hong Kong and whether they were engaged in party activities. If I remember rightly, some 13 were found to have been using their official capacities as Ministers to go touting for funds in Hong Kong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I assume that the hon. Member for Warley, West will reply to both interventions. Before anybody makes another intervention, he must be given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Spellar: It is unfortunate, given that I spoke quite slowly when I explained the purpose of the Bill to the hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth, that not one jot of that explanation entered the head of the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, who read out her Conservative central office brief again. She still does not understand the basis of the Bill, which is unfortunate.

I shall deal with the question of overseas donations, which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting, a little later when I have dealt with clause 1.

Lady Olga Maitland: Answer my question.

Mr. Spellar: It is unfortunate that, in spite of much repetition—I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have become slightly bored by it—the basis of the Bill has still not got across to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam.

Lady Olga Maitland: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order, when I put a question to the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), for him to dodge it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order and the hon. Lady knew that full well before she raised it. I will deal with genuine points of order. Points of order that are not genuine—they are common in this place—should not be raised and hon. Members should not test the Chair's patience by repeatedly doing so.

Mr. Spellar: Clause 1 would require political parties to publish accounts. That requirement is so unremarkable that as far as back as December 1949 the House passed a resolution that "political parties, and all other organisations having political action as one of their aims, should publish annually full and adequate statements of their accounts."

Unfortunately, although there have been some minor improvements from the Conservative party, it has not seen fit to implement that resolution.

I referred earlier to the charter movement in the Conservative party. Concern at the failure to implement the resolution is not confined to Opposition Members. Conservative Members will be aware of the charter movement in the Conservative party, which has argued, on a broader front, for a formal party constitution. Extraordinarily, the main defence of the Tory party a few years ago, in a case involving the Inland Revenue, was that the party did not exist at all. The Conservative charter movement wants proper accounts and, it says,

"full control over the party's money must be exercised by the elected officers who must be accountable to the membership."

That seems unremarkable, but to the mandarins of the Conservative party it is fearsomely democratic. Conservative party members need real accountability.

The charter movement posed some interesting questions to the former party chairman, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler). It asked:

"Why has there been a consistent refusal to publish a balance sheet? If we are incorrect in our estimate of the balance sheet position at 31st March 1992, what other funds are there directly or indirectly controlled by the party which covered in whole or in part the deficit of £17 million and where are they located?"

Both the charter movement and the public want to know whether the funds held in this country are the only funds under the control of the Conservative party or whether there are funds in Jersey and elsewhere—

Mr. Jenkin: It is no secret that the Conservative party has a whacking great overdraft, let alone funds in Jersey or anywhere else.

Mr. Spellar: It is certainly no secret that at that time the Conservative party had a £17 million overdraft. That begs the question why the Royal Bank of Scotland so easily allowed an overdraft of that size to build up with no immediate way of its being repaid. Again, transparency would enable the Conservative party to dispel the argument that the overdraft was carried by the bank because it had an assurance of other sources of funds being held in reserve elsewhere. That may or may not be true, but if the Conservative party were open about its accounts it could confirm or deny that impression.

The charter movement asked:

"What were the sources of the said £7 million received from abroad in 1991-92?"

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting mentioned that matter and I shall return to it later. The charter movement also asked:

"From how many sources were individual sums in excess of £1 million received in those years?"

It then asked questions about loans and borrowings.

All those are extremely important questions both for members of the Conservative party and for the electorate. It is worth noting that recommendations on the publication of funds were included in the report of the Home Affairs Select Committee in 1994. It was not a particularly good report; it covered up a number of matters. However, on the publication of funds it was clear and unequivocal. It said:

"We believe that every party should make published accounts available to all those who request them."

That is fairly straightforward and of interest to hon. Members, the public and members of the Conservative party.

The issue does not involve just income. I suspect that Conservative party members would like to know what happens to their money. Indeed, there was uproar when members discovered that it was being used to finance the legal costs of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). It is estimated that the party lost about £500,000 in donations from its ordinary members because of their outrage at that action.

Conservative party members might be interested to know how much it cost to finance the legal action of Mr. Paul Judge against The Guardian. The estimate is £300,000. That does not seem to be an effective use of party funds.

Mr. Jenkin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My understanding is that the Bill would regulate the funding of political parties, which most people would accept includes donations. Indeed, I am happy to discuss party donations. However, the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) is exploring at length how parties spend their money. I wonder whether that is in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is in order. Second Reading debates are quite wide.

Mr. Spellar: If the hon. Gentleman had got a copy of the Bill—

Mr. Jenkin: I have one here.

Mr. Spellar: It would help if, instead of waving it, the hon. Gentleman read it. Clause 1(2) refers to

"duly audited accounts of income and expenditure in a prescribed form."

That seems fairly self-evident, and it should cover his point.

At least the donations that I have just described could be regarded as in-house and from within this country. What about the really sordid part of Conservative finances which my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting mentioned—overseas donations? Several of our fellow democracies are clear on this. They proscribe donations from overseas whether from individuals, companies or Governments. In our consultation it appeared that there were some difficulties in formulating the exact words to handle the matter. However, if we are able to do so in time before the Committee stage, the matter could be dealt with by means of a new clause.

What are the scandals with which we seek to deal? One is the question of tax exemptions. One of the benefits given to a number of donors was a tax break for foreign business men. They were given tax exemptions while resident in the United Kingdom equalled only in Switzerland, the Channel islands and Luxembourg. Estimates of the cost to the public purse of that benefit run to more than £1 billion a year. We are aware that there was a fund-raising dinner for some of those individuals and that the question of tax-exempt status was raised.

Mr. Deva: Is the hon. Gentleman aware—I am sure that he is—that about 45 per cent. of inward investment into the European Union comes to Britain and that many foreign companies are interested in investing in Britain and creating employment? If they believe that the Conservative party would create the best climate and best look after their interests, what is wrong with their investing here and also supporting the Conservative party if they so wish?

Mr. Spellar: Companies in Britain would not be covered by the exemption. That is an issue that the hon. Gentleman might like to take up. So far as I am aware, none of the major investors into Britain, such as Toyota, Nissan, Honda, Sony and Fujitsu, is a donor to the Conservative party. I am talking about rich individuals and their tax-exempt status. That is nothing to do with inward investment. Incidentally, if the hon. Gentleman talks to companies that invest here, he may find that the most attractive feature is that we speak the English language, which is their language of business. I have spoken to several companies about that. If I go any further on that, you will pull me back, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The key area is donations not from those who may be temporarily resident in this country and take advantage of tax-exempt status but from those who are overseas. Ministers, including the Prime Minister, visited Hong Kong. It appears that the then high commissioner in Hong Kong was extremely concerned that some official engagements were turned down so that Ministers could go to a major fund-raising dinner in Hong Kong. Why was Mr. Li Ka-Shing, a major figure in Beijing as well as in Hong Kong, such a major donor to the Conservative party? One of the problems of the Conservative party is that, with the cooling of relations with China, some of those donations have ended.

Mr. Jenkin: A business man in Hong Kong might have regard to the fact that the ultimate responsibility for the Government of Hong Kong lies with the elected Government of this country. Therefore, he has an interest in ensuring that a sensible Government are elected in Britain, instead of a silly one from the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Spellar: That argument might convince the hon. Gentleman but no one else would agree that people who do not live, or have the right to vote in, this country should be able to give huge sums to a political party. People find that proposition extraordinary, as they do in many other major countries.

It is interesting that it can still be argued that people who are not resident, or who are not voters, in this country should seek to be able to buy influence and policy. The hon. Member for Colchester, North is saying that they should be able to buy the Government they want by donating money to enable a party to compete in elections. That involves not only Hong Kong but United States foundations and even, possibly, overseas Governments. They are all potential or alleged donors. In the case of Hong Kong, there are more facts about donations designed to keep one party in power in Britain.

Mr. Cox: We have already touched on Asil Nadir, but I hope that we have not left him completely. It is all on the record; this is not, as Conservative Members are suggesting, just innuendo. We know from parliamentary answers from the Attorney-General that when Mr. Nadir, before he fled the country, was being investigated by the serious fraud squad, Cabinet Ministers, who were not his parliamentary representative, met the Attorney-General. We can only guess why, when they were not his parliamentary representative, they should go to see a Law Officer. We know from replies to parliamentary questions that seven Back Benchers approached the Attorney-General about the serious fraud case against Mr. Nadir.

Mr. Spellar: My hon. Friend has spelt out strongly the problems that were associated with that case and why we believe that the Government were so reticent about it. It comes back to the principle that is sometimes enunciated by Home Office Ministers in discussing the right to silence, when they say that those who have nothing to hide have nothing to fear. We suspect that the Conservative party has much to fear.

Mr. Garnier: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in its evidence to the Home Affairs Select Committee, the Labour party conceded that it was not against its principles to receive foreign donations, and admitted receiving them from citizens of the United States? Does he think that that was wrong?

Mr. Spellar: I think that we should proscribe donations from abroad. I thought that I had said that clearly not only in this speech but when I sought leave to introduce the Bill. I am pleased to have the support of the hon. and learned Gentleman, who obviously favours such a provision.

The attraction of money from Hong Kong and other dubious sources for Conservative Members was well expressed by a previous leader of the Conservative party, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, in 1927 when he said:

"Our one great advantage: wealth. Let us use it. Its expenditure should be regarded as an insurance premium."

That insurance premium is coming not only from business in Britain, but, worse, from business abroad.

We must consider the matter in further detail so that we can get it right. I hope that the commission will be able to draw on the experience of the United States and Australia in particular. That will be its role. I hope that it will make a better job of it than the Select Committee did.

Let us be clear what the Bill is seeking to introduce. Many thoughtful Conservatives realise that the situation in which they find themselves is untenable and indefensible. They understand that a valid, sensible measure should be introduced, which will open up the matter to public scrutiny.

In the words of an American Supreme court justice,

"Sunlight is the best disinfectant in a democracy."

The Bill will benefit not only the wider electoral democracy in this country but democracy in the Conservative party. If the Government try to prevent the matter from being brought to a vote today or to frustrate the will of Parliament, which was clearly expressed on 31 January, we and the electorate will rightly conclude that they have a lot to hide and to fear. That is why I have no hesitation in commending the Bill to the House.

2.4 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I listened with as much interest as I could summon to the arguments of the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar). He is probably the only Member of Parliament who has been known to introduce a Bill and talk it out himself. He has been on his feet for nearly an hour, knowing very well that he had limited time. If he had been keen to get the measure on to the statute book, he would have been more succinct and would have dealt with the interjections of his hon. Friends and Conservative Members with greater celerity, but there we are.

[Mr. Edward Garnier]

It may be of interest to the hon. Member for Warley, West to learn that the Bill has come up for debate today, not because of some speedy and nefarious deal done yesterday to confuse the other sponsors, but because the Bill between this one and the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Bill was withdrawn on 3 April. The hon. Members for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), for Workington (Mr. Campbell–Savours), for Paisley, South (Mr. McMaster), for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) and for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane), all of whom sponsored the Bill with the hon. Member for Warley, West, are absent and have failed to look at the business papers to ascertain that the Bill in front of this one was withdrawn from discussion on 3 April. That gives us some indication of the seriousness with which the Bill was introduced.

The way in which the hon. Member for Warley, West handled the Second Reading debate gives yet further evidence for and support to my suggestion that the Bill is nothing more than a political stunt. Let us compare the way in which the Sexual Offences (Conspiracy and Incitement) Bill was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and the way in which he dealt with it this morning and in Committee. One can draw no other conclusion than that this Bill is a cheap and silly little stunt and a waste of parliamentary time. One only has to consider the way in which that earlier Bill was dealt with to realise what can be done with a sensible and well-meaning Bill that needs to be brought into play.

Since I think that I am the only hon. Member present who was on the Home Affairs Select Committee that dealt with the funding of political parties I must also point out that, if the hon. Member for Sunderland, South—a sponsor of the Bill, who was also a member of our Select Committee—had thought the Bill of such great importance, he would have been here for to give it a fair wind, if that is the right expression when dealing with the remarks of the hon. Member for Warley, West, not least because he and his colleague the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), along with the research department at Walworth road, drafted the minority report, most of which was regurgitated in his speech.

Since the hon. Member for Warley, West chose to concentrate only on that minority report, it is fair that the House should learn a little more about the majority report that dealt with the sourcing of political funds with which clause 1 of the Bill deals. I cannot remember whether the hon. Gentleman bothered to refer to clause 1 in detail, but it states:

"The Secretary of State shall, by regulations, require each political party to publish annually details of the source and amount of every donation of £1000 or more made to it in the course of the year."

There are two issues there—source and amount. The cut-off amount seems to be £1,000.

In its report, the Select Committee considered evidence from a great many people on this subject, and the arguments for and against disclosure have been succinctly set out. I shall summarise the arguments for the House's benefit, so that it can have them in mind—not only the hon. Gentleman's rantings—when reaching its conclusions about the good sense of the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), who was then the chairman of the Conservative party, argued that privacy in donations was as fundamental a right when giving to political parties as it was when giving to any other charitable organisation. I should hope that the hon. Member for Warley, West would have the decency to accept that that point is not only arguable but right.

Mr. Spellar indicated dissent.

Mr. Garnier: Does the hon. Gentleman wish to intervene?

Mr. Spellar: The hon. and learned Gentleman asked if we would agreed to that proposition, and I say certainly not. In a democracy, the electorate have a right to know who is donating to the political parties that are seeking to run the country and then to draw their own conclusions. That is the Bill's essence.

Mr. Garnier: I think that we have the beginnings of a reasonable argument; the hon. Gentleman has put forward his case, and I shall remind the House of what the then chairman of the Conservative party said in response to that line of argument.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield said that what individuals do with their money is entirely a matter for them, and I suggest that it is not a legitimate interest for inquisitive journalists, political opponents or even the state to know what private individuals give to Oxfam, for example, or to the Labour party, the Conservative party or the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. The interest pretended by the hon. Gentleman is merely prurient and has no genuine public interest basis.

I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield that to reveal the name of an individual donor would be a breach of that donor's right to privacy, although there is nothing to stop an individual donor making his name known if he chooses to do so. Perhaps one of the differences between the interfering, statist Labour party and the Conservative party, of which I am a member, is that the Conservative party respects and hopes to protect the individual's rights, and perhaps that is why a gulf is emerging across the Floor of the House in this debate.

Mr. Jenkin: Did my hon. and learned Friend notice that the hon. Member for Warley, West implied in his intervention that he thought that political parties are elected to the Government to represent the electorate in the House of Commons? Individuals, of course, are elected to the House of Commons. Individuals might stand for election and raise their election funds under a party label, but the electorate vote for individuals in elections. We sit in the House of Commons as individuals, and it is as individuals that we represent our constituents. We do not elect a party apparatus to Government—we elect individuals.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend has made a very telling point, and he made it very well. It is not surprising that the Labour party is the recipient of a huge amount of trade union funds because the trade unions buy policy. The trade unions buy up the Labour party—it is as simple as that. The trade unions attempted between 1974 and 1979 to buy up that Labour Government, and no doubt they are intending and hoping to buy up a future Labour Government. That was the point made by my hon. Friend, and it is a legitimate point, about which the public should continually be reminded.

I am glad that this debate is providing us with an opportunity to remind the public what the Labour party is about—not only through the mechanics of this Bill but through their general philosophy of action, which is to buy up blocks of influence in any way possible to determine the country's future. Individuals and interest groups in this country would be well advised to bear in mind the rather nasty nature of the Labour party that hides behind the smile of its current leader. That lesson will no doubt be learnt more clearly in the next year as the Labour party begins to unravel and to distract itself by its own divisions.

The Home Affairs Select Committee went on to discuss the threshold at which disclosure ought to be made, assuming that it should be made. It was common ground, apparently, that "small donors had a right to privacy because no-one could allege that their gift had been made with any ulterior purpose."

I query that, to the extent that many members of trade unions individually make small donations by way of the political levy which go into a much larger pot, which hammers on to the side of the directing mind, if that is the right expression, of the Labour party.

Mr. Cox: I do not know what the hon. and learned Member knows about the trade union movement, but he referred to the political levy. Is he aware that, under trade union legislation, all trade unionists have to ballot whether they wish to contribute to the political levy of a political party? Does the hon. and learned Gentleman know that?

Mr. Garnier: I not only knew that, but the hon. Gentleman missed the point that I was making—that many people make small donations. It was common ground in the Home Affairs Select Committee that those who make small donations should not be interfered with because the size of their donation could have no real bearing upon the management and policy making of the party to which they were making donations. The point I was making, and I shall say it again slowly so the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) can take it in [Interruption.]—

Mr. Cox: You are not in court now.

Mr. Garnier: The small donations that are brought into an agglomeration through the political levy of the trade union system, once agglomerated, create a huge power of influence. That financial influence is applied to the Labour party to get it to produce policies and go in a direction that is sympathetic to the desires of the membership of the trade union. That is the point, and if it embarrasses the Labour party, so be it.

The evidence given by the parties to the Home Affairs Select Committee on the question of threshold relates directly to the issue of source and amount in clause 1. The Committee noted that, at "the top end of the scale, the Green Party proposed that the names of individuals giving over £50,000 per annum (and the names of all organisations giving gifts) should be disclosed; the SNP suggested that all donations above £20,000 should be published in a party's accounts"—

a Professor Harrison proposed £10,000—

"the Labour Party suggested various figures between £10,000 and £1,000 for individual donors, though, according to Mr. Whitty—

then general secretary of the Labour party—

"revealing donations of around £150 'would not cause us great difficulty'.; the Liberal Democrats proposed £5,000 as a figure which might be acceptable to other parties, though they were also prepared to reveal donors down to a much lower level; the TUC favoured donations of over £1,000 by individuals and £200 by companies being disclosed".

The Transport and General Workers Union argued for disclosure above

"'say £500 or £1,000'."

The Committee also noted:

"Among those who favoured a disclosure limit but did not mention a particular amount were the SDLP"— is that the Northern Irish party?

Mr. Jenkin: Yes.

Mr. Garnier: —and

"Charter 88 and the Charter Movement."

The Institute of Public Policy Research, which I believe is a body sympathetic to the Labour party, suggested that

"'5 or 6 figure' sums were of considerable importance to the United Kingdom's relatively impoverished political parties."

The witnesses were asked whether as low a threshold for disclosure as just over £150 would be acceptable, and both the officials from the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties emphasised that there would be, as the general secretary of the Labour party, Mr. Whitty, said

"'a lot of bureaucratic hassle' in doing so."

It may be that the philosophy behind the figure of £1,000 mentioned in the Bill promoted by the hon. Member for Warley, West has nothing to do with the wider principle of disclosure, about which we obviously disagree, but is simply one of administrative convenience.

Anything below £150 or £500—take whatever figure one likes—would grossly inconvenience individual members of the Labour party because it is likely, according to the historic nature of the Labour party's membership, that individual donations from Labour party members would come at the lower end of the scale, whereas those at the higher end of the scale would be likely to be given, again according to historical evidence, by members of the Conservative party. A nasty little piece of party political discrimination, dressed up as a matter of high principle, is coming in under the fence.

A number of issues concern us. Questions of privacy are involved, as I mentioned earlier, as are questions of administrative practicality. The more donors that a party will be required to list, the more cumbersome the procedure will become. Eighteen months ago, the Home Affairs Select Committee learned that, in the United States—where funding is principally directed to individual candidates rather than to political parties—the candidates must register the name, address and occupation of all people who donate more than $200 to them.

The inquirer at the Federal Election Commission can obtain a computer print-out that lists, for example, all female physicians in Florida who donated more than $200 to candidate X. A considerable bureaucracy is involved, even if the system is based on the citizen's right to know—which I think is the principle that, at best, the hon.

[Mr. Garnier]

Member for Warley, West was trying to use in support of his case. The hon. Gentleman cannot get much comfort from what occurs in Germany, because parties there need reveal details only of donors who contribute more than DM20,000 in a year.

The thrust of the hon. Gentleman's Bill has to be borne in mind because we are not talking about a two-party Conservative-Labour system—there are a number of small parties, some of which he and I might tolerate and some of which he and I would jointly abhor. For a small regional party, a donation of £1,000 might be a substantial sum and have some significance locally, but given that small parties do not have much influence by and large it would have no significance nationally. Therefore, a £1,000 donation would have no bearing on the movement of the constitution.

In the case of the larger political parties, a £1,000 donation might be welcome, but it will not exactly move the ship. British Airways withdrew its donation when it was cross with the Conservative Government for not doing what it thought was in its interests. That had absolutely no effect on the Conservative party—I do not know how much money British Airways used to donate, but it would have been more than £1,000. That is an example of how a huge donation to a political party—contrary to what the hon. Gentleman might suspect—has absolutely no influence on its philosophy, policies and direction.

Another example is the Duke of Westminster. The hon. Gentleman may remember the Housing and Urban Development Bill of 1993, which was renamed the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Bill. Now that it is safely into law, I can say that it is the nearest thing to theft that I have seen pass through the House. I was a new Member of the House in those days and I thought that what we did was always wonderful. The Duke of Westminster withdrew his support from the Conservative party because he believed that the Bill was antipathetic to his property interests—and he was quite right. His threat of removing his donation from the Conservative party had no bearing on the passage of the Bill through Parliament. However, he decided to vote against it or to abstain.

Mr. Spellar: The hon. and learned Gentleman, like a number of Conservative Members, regularly cites these two cases as though they somehow disprove the proposition. In fact, in many ways they are an endorsement of it. British Airways and the Duke of Westminster, like many other donors to the Conservative party, had an expectation that matters that were going to be in their interests would be decided in their interests. We do not hear from the hon. Gentleman about people who get their knighthoods, get their peerages and get the decisions in their favour. We hear about people who had that expectation but had it frustrated.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman should do us the courtesy of reading—and, if he has read it, understanding—the evidence that was given to the Home Affairs Select Committee. The same canards were produced by Labour members of the Home Affairs Select Committee in the hearings before us 18 months ago. It beggars belief how those hon. Members who asked those questions could do so with a straight face, bearing in mind the history of abuse of the honours system engineered by the Labour party in the past 50 or 60 years—but let us leave that aside.

The simple point, and the answer to the question by the hon. Member for Warley, West, was given clearly by my right hon. Friend the then chairman of the Conservative party, my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield.

Perhaps the Labour party has been out of Government for so long that Labour Members do not realise it, but there is a thing called the Honours Committee, which scrutinises all applications for honours. Every time that an application is made for a political honour, the Committee scrutinises it to ensure that it is a proper application. Every time that there is a "big business" application, the Committee, which is made up of members of all parties—or at least the three big parties—scrutinises it to ensure that the honour is being awarded, not for political skulduggery, as the hon. Gentleman would have it, but for public service or for service to industry, to exports or to charity.

The suggestion that is constantly repeated by Labour Members simply to make childish-sounding debating points does them no credit. It would do the hon. Member for Warley, West a great deal more credit if he were to take the trouble to read not only his hon. Friend's minority report but the all-party majority report, which is here for all to see.

The conclusion that the Home Affairs Select Committee reached on this aspect of its report was that the Committee—

"we"—

"do not believe that a case has been made out for requiring disclosure of the identity of donors; where donations are made from identifiable and legitimate sources known to the party they should be allowed to remain private."

That is a sensible working arrangement, which accepts and respects the privacy of the individual to donate money to whomever and to whatever organisation he or she considers appropriate.

The Committee said that it did not believe that any limit on the amount a donor could give would be acceptable in British circumstances. It dealt with company donations; I invite hon. Members to read the passages about that, because I know that the hon. Member for Tooting wishes to speak and I am reasonably sure that other Conservative Members wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Having demolished as politely as I can the good sense of the Bill, I leave the Floor to others.

2.27 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I shall not waste the time of the House commenting on the previous speech.

The debate has been very interesting. My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) has done a service by bringing the matter to the attention of the House, even though time has been limited, because the general public obviously wish to know who funds political parties.

We heard, as we always do, about the trade union movement. I am a sponsored trade union Member, and all the moneys that are allocated to my political party are very clearly recorded.

I wish to speak about Mr. Asil Nadir. I am chairman of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association Cyprus group in the House, so this issue is of very great interest to me.

Before people start to criticise the length of the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West, they should read the Official Report on Monday and see the fanatical interventions that he faced.

Mr. Nadir met very senior members of the Conservative party many times over a very long period. We know that they have admitted that he gave very substantial sums to the Conservative party. I understand that the former party chairman, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), has never denied that. All he has said is, "I am not really sure, and we are not really sure, whether that money was stolen. Until we are certain, we will hang on to it." We know that Mr. Nadir had the opportunity to meet senior Conservative Cabinet Ministers and senior Back-Bench Members. We are in no doubt—Mr. Nadir said it himself—that he was looking for a knighthood. He did not receive one and he must have been extremely disappointed.

It became known that Mr. Nadir was a crook—I choose my words carefully: he was and is a crook and is sheltering in occupied northern Cyprus. We learned more about Mr. Nadir's failed business activities. All hon. Members know that, under parliamentary convention, one hon. Member does not interfere in another hon. Member's constituency unless he or she is asked about constituency issues—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 30th April, the Speaker shall put the Question on the first Motion in the name of Mr. Tony Blair relating to Education not later than one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings thereon or half-past Eleven o'clock, whichever is the earlier; no further such Motion shall be made after that hour; and the said Motions may be proceeded with, though opposed, after the expiry of the time for opposed business.—[Mr. Wells.]

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you bring to the attention of Madam Speaker when you next see her the objections that were made to two Bills today—Bills Nos. 5 and 10, especially Bill No. 10? We have spent much of this morning discussing the important issues surrounding Bill No. 10. Will you bring to the attention of Madam Speaker the utter disgust felt by many hon. Members that the Government Whip deliberately objected to both those Bills.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): That is not a matter for the Chair.

Air Quality (Nottingham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wells.]

2.32 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I am delighted to bring before the House today the important subject of air pollution, particularly as it affects my constituency and the city of Nottingham. Last week, three 11-year-old pupils of Southglade junior school in Bestwood park in my constituency wrote to me about the issue. Abby Herod, Laura Bowen and Zoe Tolcher said in their letter:

"We are disappointed with the atmosphere that we are breathing in. We would like you to put a stop to all the fumes that are coming from all the cars and factories. Couldn't we use bicycles and buses more often—that will make less fumes and gases so the air will be safer."

I should like to dedicate today's debate to those three young people, and to the many others in my constituency who have this week discussed the issue of air pollution in Nottingham and elsewhere.

Those young people will be the main campaigners when we tackle the problem seriously in the future. They will save the planet from air pollution, and they will see through the policies necessary to ensure that our air is once again fit to breathe.

Local media will also play an important role. The local newspaper, the Nottingham Evening Post, has led a vociferous air quality campaign in our city. It is essential that the politicians and the decision-makers—I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), is to respond to the debate—are informed about public opinion.

We have no choice but to breathe air which continues to be polluted. Poor air quality causes poor health. Britain's air quality has deteriorated by 35 per cent. in the past 10 years. Asthma kills about 2,000 people a year, and one in seven children in Nottingham are affected by asthma, like children in every constituency throughout the land.

The link between air pollution and worsening asthma conditions is now well accepted. A recent study in Birmingham found that children admitted to hospital with asthma were more likely to live close to busy roads than those who were admitted for other reasons. Government research has linked airborne particles to lung and heart disease. It is now accepted that lower levels of pollution than originally thought adversely affect health.

Much good work has been done in this area in Nottingham and elsewhere, dating back to the 1950s. The most obvious pollutants have been dealt with: the smoke and sulphur dioxide created by coal burning and factory emissions have been subject to ever greater controls. However, the main air pollution villain in modern Britain, including in my constituency, is the motor car and other vehicular traffic which burns diesel and petrol fuels.

Unfortunately, delays in Government funding for Nottingham's automatic urban monitoring station mean that I do not have the precise figures for Nottingham's air quality. However, I imagine that they are not dissimilar to the figures for London's air quality. In London, traffic is responsible for 99 per cent. of carbon monoxide emissions, 76 per cent. of nitrogen oxides and 96 per cent.

of black smoke, including particulates. It is a sad record, but I am delighted to report that the local authorities in Nottingham and the surrounding area are working hard to solve the problem, and they have made a great deal of progress.

Despite 85 per cent. of its revenue being at the beck and call of Government—like that of most other local authorities—Nottingham has set about tackling the air pollution problem. I pay tribute to those in the city and in the county council—both at officer and at councillor level—for their hard work. I shall give some examples of that work.

Nottingham city council has introduced a pioneering scheme, the green commuter scheme, which I had the privilege of helping to launch several months ago. It aims to reduce traffic congestion and to improve air quality. The county council is encouraging its staff to car-share and to use their cars less for journeys to work—the first time that any county council has introduced such a scheme.

The same two councils have been involved in conducting pioneering research with Dr. Margaret Bell and her team at the university of Nottingham. Pollution monitors worth £140,000 are now in place at schools, roundabouts and junctions in and around Nottingham, and they are linked to the urban traffic control centre. Those devices monitor traffic flow—the stops and starts, the congestion and the pollution—and produce a report on the city's air quality. The project hopes that, by revealing how changes in transport affect the quality of environment, it will encourage ideas on reducing the need for travel and promoting public transport by encouraging people to live closer to their place of work, use bicycles or, where appropriate, walk to work.

I hope that the Minister will take up my offer to come to Nottingham and see that valuable work. I know that he will be impressed, and I very much hope that he will feel that it is some of the best practice in the United Kingdom, which he may wish to share with other local authorities to encourage them.

Nottinghamshire is the first county council to display travel information on the Internet, and it hopes shortly to explore the use of cable television and variable message signs to help reduce congestion by getting information about the state of our roads to people in their homes before they leave for work or leisure activities, thus, one hopes, helping them to decide whether to leave the car at home and use public transport.

Those local councils have proved that, if they are given the tools, they will get on with the job and help to tackle the problem of air quality and pollution in our city. We all know that much more could be done. Local authorities such as Nottingham and Nottinghamshire, although they have an excellent record in tackling air quality, as demonstrated by the introduction of smoke control areas—one needs only to talk to councillors and council officers—know that they could do a heck of a lot more if the Government helped and encouraged them along the way.

For example, work could start quickly to minimise hot spots, where pollution is particularly chronic, and to reduce the incidence of summer and winter smog. It is necessary first to pinpoint the most severe problems and measure the pollution, and then take action to alleviate it.

Councillor John Hartshorne, the chairman of the council's environment committee, told me that Nottingham was keen to be one of the pilot areas tackling traffic pollution problems, but the Government rejected its bid. Along with a number of forward-thinking authorities, Nottingham scraped together its precious spare cash—that is indeed a precious commodity in these days of restraints on local council spending—and paid for its own traffic pollution monitoring facilities.

The local authorities that were chosen for the pilot projects on congestion monitoring were given only £3 million, as opposed to the £15 million that they calculated as necessary to do the job adequately.

Another way in which councils could be encouraged to tackle the problem of local air pollution and air quality involves car and lorry exhaust checks. Half all traffic pollution is generated by just 10 per cent. of the vehicles, so spot checks on cars and lorries are vital. However, only the police have the power to stop vehicles.

I am not asking the Minister to make a snap judgment today, but to go away and think about an issue that he and the Government have already considered and that needs to be re-examined. There should be discussions with the police to figure out how that power could be shared, so that local councils, perhaps working with the Vehicle Inspectorate, in certain tightly defined circumstances could have the power to stop vehicles.

An immense number of practical problems need to be resolved. We would not want people to pretend to be vehicle inspectors or local authority employees in order to stop people who were driving alone at night, but if the power were tightly defined, perhaps by agreeing certain hours and certain places where vehicles could be stopped, and if the individuals were appropriately uniformed and had appropriately screened, local authorities might be able to get on with the job of monitoring vehicle emissions and advising drivers how best to tackle that problem. There is no easy answer, but I hope that the Minister will at least think about the problem with an open mind and see whether there is an answer to it.

The Environment Act 1995 will allow for the introduction, in 1997, of regulations giving local authorities the power to enforce local road closures and diversions if air quality standards are breached in pollution hot spots. However, although a trunk road passing through the centre of Nottingham is likely to be the primary source of traffic pollution in the area, the local authority has no powers over trunk roads, and will only be able to close, or divert traffic away from, surrounding roads. Again, the Minister may wish to look at that power to see whether it can be extended.

What can the Government do further to assist local authorities? First, they must get their own job sorted out, and get their own house in order. The Government have said that they will set national targets for the nine worst pollutants, but as yet the provisions are not in force. Although a small group of local councils are piloting the initiative, the Government have stipulated that 2005 will be the year in which they hope to achieve their air quality objectives. Surely that policy could be reviewed by the Minister.

The problem is certainly getting worse. The Department of Transport has predicted that car use will more than double its 1988 level by 2025. Unfortunately, the Government have no transport policy to speak of.

[Mr. Graham Allen]

Indeed, I understand that they want to wind up the Department of Transport, because they do not see it as having any function.

The Government also, sadly, continue to do little to promote transport choice or the shift from the private car to buses, trains, bicycles and walking. If that shift does not take place, there will be a huge increase in the number of traffic jams in my city and in cities throughout the land. The Minister well knows that a car idling in a traffic jam can double its fuel consumption, and can put double the amount of pollution into the atmosphere compared with a vehicle travelling at its best average speed.

I am not putting an anti-car view. On the contrary, we can have more cars, as people do in Germany. In Germany, however, although there is a higher level of car ownership, there is a lower level of car use, because there are adequate public transport alternatives. People have cars, but use them less; that should in many ways be the slogan we adopt in our environmental policy on traffic.

No one pretends that the answers are easy or straightforward, but much can be done at all levels—city, county and national Government. We need policy co-ordination. Professor Richard Madeley of the department of public health at Nottingham university told me that, at the moment, it can cost £2.60 for two people to go to Nottingham city centre by bus, whereas it costs only 70p to park there for two hours.

We need to consider co-ordination and integration, and we need to encourage people, not least by the price mechanism, to use appropriate forms of transport rather than doing what we all do, which is to drag the car into the middle of the city, often with only one person in it, thus holding up the bus which often has 30, 40 or 50 people in it.

Local councils need time to plan the air quality management areas proposed in the Environment Act. So far, they have received no timetable, no funding and no guidance. Perhaps the Minister can tell us why there has been a delay.

People in Nottingham and throughout the country increasingly demand clean, green alternatives to private cars. The Government must now allow local authorities to create some of the transport choices that will lead us towards a greener future. We shall also need to look at the levels of funding for local authorities so that they can perform the job appropriately. It is not necessarily a matter of more funding. The problem could be solved by having stable funding. Ministers in all spending Departments are aware that annual funding for authorities or any organisation causes difficulties for those Ministers who are trying to make serious efforts to tackle key problems.

Nottingham is trying to tackle air pollution and air quality, but it has one hand tied behind its back. The Government should consider a range of additional policies to help tackle air pollution, including encouraging employers to introduce a green commuter plan, as Nottingham has done. The Government should make public transport better, more environmentally friendly and more pleasant to use, not least by increasing the use of buses. That could be facilitated by considering bus re-regulation, which is obviously necessary in a number of our cities because cowboy operators turn up with old charabancs that belch out black smoke to the detriment of the good public, municipal and private operators. Fuels with lower sulphur content should be used.

The Government should promote changed work patterns to reduce traffic peaks and pollution hot spots. We should make the fullest use of railways and inland and coastal waterways for the transport of goods and to discourage long-haul road transport, when appropriate. We need to develop and implement alternative sources of energy to fossil fuels; introduce priority vehicle schemes in city centres; and fund park-and-ride schemes.

There are many possibilities. Public transport, for example, could use more energy-efficient vehicles. In Nottingham, we could fuel vehicles from electricity generated by burning refuse. Public transport vehicles that operate in a mainly pedestrianised city centre could be fuelled from non-fossil-fuel-generated electricity. That would make a major contribution to air quality in the city centre.

A whole raft of bright ideas and innovative thinking is out there. There are bags of ideas. I ask the Minister to consider the fact that there are answers, provided we work at them. My final words to the Minister come from the three young people that I quoted when at the beginning of my speech—Abby, Laura and Zoe. They said:

> "If you or any one else won't do something about it, this earth will soon fade away and kill every living thing. Nearly all gases are dangerous to us so can you please try and do something about this."

I could not have put it better myself.

2.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. James Clappison): I welcome the opportunity to respond to a debate on the important subject of air quality, on which much progress has recently been made. Standards are rising, and that is right. Air quality is an important issue, in Nottingham as elsewhere in the country. I am happy to accept the invitation of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) to visit Nottingham to see what is happening there.

Nottingham is part of the United Kingdom's smoke and sulphur dioxide monitoring network, and also takes part in the national nitrogen dioxide tube survey. That monitoring indicates that Nottingham experiences air quality that is, on the whole, pretty typical for urban areas in the United Kingdom, and levels of smoke and sulphur dioxide are well below the EC limit values.

We are currently improving our national monitoring networks further, to improve our assessment of the extent to which air quality standards and targets are being achieved; to provide better information to the public and other interested bodies; and to improve our understanding of air quality problems. To that end, this year we are expanding our automatic monitoring network to around 100 sites, including seven new automatic monitoring stations, one of which—the hon. Member will be pleased to hear—will be in Nottingham.

That site will provide continuous and accurate monitoring of ozone, nitrogen oxides, carbon monoxide, sulphur dioxide and particulate matter, to which the hon. Member drew attention. We are discussing an appropriate site for the station with the city council.

We need to do more than just monitor air quality. The air quality in the United Kingdom is generally pretty good, and has improved considerably over the past 30 to 40 years, but the Government recognise that many people are concerned about the smell, nuisance and potential health effects of some pollutants, We want to improve living conditions, especially in our cities and for the sake of future generations. We are determined to manage and improve air quality, both across the nation and wherever there are particular problems.

We are now preparing our first national air quality strategy, which will set air quality standards and targets and outline the measures that will be taken at international, national and local level to meet them. That will build on the controls that are already in place.

The United Kingdom already has in place one of the most sophisticated industrial air pollution control systems in Europe, consisting of integrated pollution control and local authority air pollution control. Authorisations are based upon what is described as the best available techniques not entailing excessive cost, which are reviewed every four years.

The first large review of integrated pollution control authorisations, dealing with electricity generators, has recently been completed. That will result in very substantial reductions in emissions of sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxides and particulates. Emissions of sulphur dioxide and smoke from domestic households are controlled through the smoke control area system, which was introduced in 1956. Nottingham has five integrated pollution control processes in operation and 65 local authority air pollution controls. It completed its smoke control programme in 1991, so all households in the city fall within smoke control areas.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned vehicle emission, which is another important source of pollution, besides industrial pollution. It concerns many people. Traffic is a major pollutant, and in many of our towns and cities today it is the main source of air pollution.

Emissions from the transport sector are mainly controlled through European Community legislation, in particular through emission standards for new vehicles and standards on the quality of automotive fuels. European standards for new vehicles were agreed in the early 1990s, which made the fitting of catalytic convertors to petrol cars compulsory from 1993. Even more stringent standards for vehicles have been agreed for 1996-97.

These measures will provide the backbone to our policies for reducing emissions from road transport. As the proportion of vehicles conforming to the tougher standards grows, emissions of air pollutants should fall dramatically over the next 10 years—despite a likely steady rise in the size of the vehicle fleet and the number of kilometres driven. However, an increase in the volume of traffic will affect that picture over the longer term. Therefore, we need further progress to reduce average emissions per vehicle.

The European Commission is expected to bring forward new proposals for vehicle emission and fuel quality standards for the year 2000 and beyond. We shall be looking to agree a positive, cost-effective package of measures that will bring down vehicle emissions substantially and bring us closer to meeting our air quality objectives. As the cleaner vehicles come to predominate in the fleet, we will also tighten the enforcement standards for them, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

However, technological fixes are not enough; patterns of behaviour must change as well. We are therefore encouraging public and private fleet operators to act in an environmentally responsible way, and we are providing the public with information about greener motoring habits. We need a framework for that action to ensure that everyone understands what the important air quality priorities really are; we need to bring that home to people.

Mr. Allen: I thank the Minister for his courtesy in giving way. What is the current state of the debate on the diesel versus petrol problem? Many of us bought diesel cars thinking we were doing the right and the green thing. Now we are told to have second thoughts.

Mr. Clappison: We keep the question of emissions from diesel under close review. The hon. Gentleman referred to particulates. He will know that there is an issue about emissions from diesels. He will also know the measures to deal with that taken by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor in the last Budget, which perhaps reflect the changed thinking to which the hon. Gentleman referred. It is fair to say that diesels also cause pollution, and we will be examining that point as we seek higher standards in the European Community.

Our approach has been based on expert scientific evidence. We are working on the best available scientific advice and on the best advice on the best outcome for health.

We have recently received reports and recommendations from the independent expert panel on air quality standards, as well as the committee on the medical effects of particulates. We also take into account information from other sources such as the World Health Organisation.

On the basis of this technical and scientific advice, we are looking to set down clear national standards and objectives for air quality, to be achieved by a given timetable. We seek a national strategy backed up by flexible and cost-effective action at a local level, through the system of local air quality management areas, to which the hon. Member adverted. In the time that is left, I emphasise that they have an important role to play, particularly in the local management areas to which the hon. Gentleman adverted.

We are also committed to keeping our policies under review to ensure that progress is maintained. As the hon. Gentleman implied a moment ago, scientific views and knowledge change and we have to keep abreast of those changes. We also have to make the best possible information available to the general public.

Our air quality strategy is under consideration. We have been putting in place the elements for it. It will shortly be available. We look forward to building on the considerable achievements that we have already had in improving air quality. We want to see improved air quality for future generations. We are taking the action to achieve this. I am sure that will be welcome to everyone, including to the three young ladies in the hon. Gentleman's constituency to whom he referred.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 1 April 1996

PRIME MINISTER

Government Policy (South-West)

Mr. Coe: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of arrangements for co-ordinating Government policy towards the south-west. [24461]

The Prime Minister: The Government office for the south-west already plays a valuable role in ensuring close dialogue between Government and the people, businesses and local representative bodies of the south-west. But this is the largest English region, and it has distinct identities and needs. In recognition of this, I have asked the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration to act as a central co-ordinator of Government policy towards the south-west. Working with colleagues in the relevant Government Departments, my hon. Friend will take a close interest in the broad issues affecting the whole of the south-west, but will focus particularly on the concerns and interests of the peninsular counties of Devon and Cornwall.

Ministerial Reponsibility

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about ministerial responsibility for volunteering, the voluntary sector and charity matters. [24475]

The Prime Minister: In consultation with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, I have decided that ministerial responsibility for:

Government co-ordination of policy on the voluntary sector including volunteering, charity matters, including sponsorship of the charity commission grants to voluntary sector infra-structure bodies, sponsorship of the National Lottery Charities Board, the Community Development Foundation and the Volunteering Partnership, should be transferred as soon as the necessary financial and other arrangements can be made from my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage. I have concluded that these matters will fit more appropriately within the framework of the responsibilities of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, who already has responsibility for other lottery distributors.

No. 10 Downing Street (Receptions)

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister who hosted the reception held at No. 10 Downing street on (a) 7 November 1994 and (b) Monday 6 November 1995. [23724]

The Prime Minister: My wife hosted a reception on 7 November 1994. There was no reception on 6 November 1995.

EU Legislation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister how many pieces of existing Community legislation have been repealed or amended in each of the past three years. [23698]

The Prime Minister: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Much new Council and Commission legislation supersedes, repeals or amends existing legislation.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister which Ministers have hosted non-official party receptions of functions in No. 10 Downing street since July 1993. [23605]

The Prime Minister: The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has hosted three receptions since July 1993.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all the functions for industrialists held at No. 10 Downing street which were attended by the chairman of the Conservation party since November 1990. [23777]

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, none.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals he will bring forward to the international community to address health problems among the population of Iraq. [23757]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 29 March 1996]: United Nations Security Council resolution 986 is designed to bring much-needed relief to the people of Iraq by permitting the sale of oil to purchase more humanitarian supplies. Iraq has so far refused to implement the resolution. We, and a number of other countries, already give substantial support to humanitarian projects in Iraq, many of which specifically address health needs. Food and medical supplies are not subject to United Nations sanction.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Minister if he will make it his policy to compensate fully any person who has contracted CJD from beef since 1989. [23602]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 29 March 1996]: Any claim for compensation would be considered within the framework of the Government's legal obligations.

TREASURY

Capital Projects (Voluntary Contributions)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make voluntary contributions to capital projects tax deductible. [21879]

Mr. Jack: Voluntary contributions to capital projects will commonly be tax deductible under the present system. For instance, a person who, for the purposes of his or his tenant's trade, contributes towards another's capital expenditure can generally claim capital allowances on that contribution. And businesses can have a deduction in calculating business profits for tax purposes for contributions to a capital project if the expenditure is revenue in nature and incurred wholly and exclusively for business purposes.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidelines are currently in force in his Department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within his Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases. [22860]

Mrs. Angela Knight: It is Treasury policy that all contracts to be placed by the Department with a potential value of over £10,000 should be the subject of a competitive under tender. The Government's public purchasing policy consolidated guidelines require goods and services to be acquired by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary, such as (a) the requirement cannot be sufficiently defined so that normal tendering procedures cannot be adopted; (b) there are insufficient firms in the market capable or willing to bid; (c) intellectual property rights restrict the options available; or (d) extreme urgency, where for example public safety is at risk. All competitive tenders are processed by the Department's purchasing unit. Cases for single tendering are put to the unit where they are evaluated on an individual basis, following the guidelines.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by his Department and executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if he will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by his Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22872]

Mrs. Knight: It is Treasury policy that all purchases made by the Department should be subject to competition. Each exception is treated on its merits. Individual contracts would each need to be checked to determine the overall number in this category, the value of each such contract and the reason why it was awarded on a single course basis. This information could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Manufacturing Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures for United Kingdom exports of manufactures in the form of the first three lines of the table in page 31 of the March OECD main economic indicators. [22959]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The best available estimates of values of UK exports of manufactures in US dollars at 1991 prices can be made from information available from the CSO database which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total cost of answering parliamentary questions in each parliamentary Session since 1989–90. [22902]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The estimated cost of answering questions to Treasury Ministers is given in the list:

1989–90: £219,000
1990–91: £164,000
1991–92: £104,000
1992–93: £342,000
1993–94: £208,000
1994–95: £256,000.

These figures are based on service-wide average costs and assume that half the questions tabled for oral answer were in fact answered in writing.

EDS Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what out-sourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23740]

Mrs. Angela Knight: None of these agencies holds out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the terms of contract the Inland Revenue has with the EDS computer system; and if he will make a statement. [23718]

Mr. Jack: I am unable, on the ground of commercial confidentiality, to give any details of specific provisions contained with the contract between Inland Revenue and EDS.

Season Tickets (Taxation)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the amount of revenue which the Treasury accrued in the financial year 1994–95 from the taxation of staff perquisites in relation to bus and rail season tickets. [23711]

Mr. Jack: Employees are generally liable to income tax on vouchers provided for free or cheap travel. Where the employee takes a cheap or interest-free loan from the employer to purchase a season ticket, no tax is chargeable if the total balance outstanding does not exceed £5,000 at any time in the year of assessment in question.

Estimates of the revenue raised from the taxation of these vouchers and loans are not available.

Earnings Statistics

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the change in real take-home pay for (i) a one-earner couple with two children and (ii) a single person on (a) 75 per cent., (b) 100 per cent. and (c) 150 per cent. of average male earnings, in pounds per week at 1995–96 prices, to the nearest 5p in the years 1990–91 to 1991–92 and 1992–93 to 1993–94. [22388]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 25 March 1996]: The information requested is contained in the table.

Change in real take-home pay
(£s per week to the nearest 5p 1995–96 prices)

Percentage of male average earnings	75 per cent.	100 per cent.	150 per cent.
1990–91 to 1991–92[1]
One-earner couple with 2 children[2]	5.95	7.40	9.10
Single	5.40	6.80	9.10
1992–93 to 1993–94[2]
One-earner couple with 2 children[2]	3.35	4.30	6.20
Single	3.10	4.05	3.30

[1] Two child benefit regimes were in operation during 1991–92—one covering April 1991 to September 1991 and one from October 1991 to March 1992. The year average of the two regimes is used in this calculation.
[2] Child benefit is treated as a negative income tax.

Tax Reliefs

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual expected cost to the Exchequer of the tax reliefs on (a) personal equity plans, (b) tax-exempt special savings accounts and (c) national savings products, in (i) 1995–96 and (ii) 1996–97. [22776]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 26 March 1996]: The latest estimates are in the table.

Estimated total cost of tax relief

	1995–96[1 2] £ million	1996–97[1 2 3] £ million
PEPs[4]	450	650
TESSAs	450	350
National Savings Products[5]	350	350

[2] These figures are tentative and subject to a wide margin of error. They have been rounded to the nearest £25 million.
[3] The cost will fall in 1996–97 due to the reduction in the basic rate of income tax on savings from 25 per cent. to 20 per cent. and follow-up accounts starting with only the capital (but none of the interest or bonuses) from the first TESSA.
[4] Including the CGT cost of capital gains within Personal Equity plans.
[5] Cost of exemption of interest on National Savings Certificates including index-linked Certificates, and first £70 of National Savings bank ordinary account interest.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue which would be raised by introducing a new upper rate of income tax of (a) 45 per cent. and (b) 50 per cent. for marginal incomes above (1) £75,000 per annum, (2) £80,000 per annum, (3) £100,000 per annum and (4) £1,000,000 per annum; and if he will estimate, in each case, the number of individuals whose post-tax incomes would be affected. [22687]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 26 March 1996]: Estimated full-year yields at 1996–97 income levels are given in the table. The estimates do not take account of any behavioural effects which might result from the introduction of such changes. It is not possible to provide a reliable estimate of the effect of introducing the higher tax rates for taxable incomes over £1,000,000.

Lower limit of taxable income	Full year revenue yield at 1996–97 income levels[1] Upper rate		Number of taxpayers affected
	45 per cent.	50 per cent.
£	£ billion	£ billion	Thousands
75,000	0.8	1.5	190
80,000	0.7	1.4	170
100,000	0.6	1.1	110

[1] The figures include consequential effects on the yield of capital gains tax.

Tax-free Lump Sums on Retirement

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the revenue consequence of restricting the tax-free lump sum on retirement to £75,000. [22689]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 26 March 1996]: I regret that the information required to provide such an estimate is not available because detailed figures on tax free payments are not required for tax administration. The current level of the earnings cap is £78,600 and from 6 April 1996 it will rise to £82,200, giving a maximum lump sum of £123,300.

Orders

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many orders under the negative resolution procedure have been brought into effect on the day they have been made since January 1995. [23316]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 29 March 1996]: None.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Defence Exports

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to establish a launch aid scheme for defence export products. [23685]

Mr. Eggar: None. The promotion of defence export product is primarily a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. The statutory basis for launch aid is the Civil Aviation Act 1982.

Aerospace Technology

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what additional support has been given to the Society of British Aerospace Companies' competitiveness challenge since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23691]

Mr. Eggar: My Department has fully supported and the Society of British Aerospace Companies' competitiveness challenge to increase the aerospace industries' competitiveness.

In addition to the £86,000 given to the competitiveness challenge, prior to the publication of the technology foresight panel's report in 1995, DTI has provided further direct financial assistance to the programme of £165,000 as well as a full-time DTI member of staff, seconded to the SBAC.

DTI has also provided £50,000 to the competitiveness challenge-related supply chain relationships in aerospace initiative.

Ms Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what additional support has been given to the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council's innovative manufacturing initiative since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23690]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The EPSRC's allocation for 1996–97 is £375.95 million. None of this has been specifically allocated by Government to the innovative manufacturing initiative and it is for EPSRC to decide how much to spend on it.

UK Space Agency

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to create a UK space agency with a dedicated space budget. [23687]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The UK's expenditure on civil space programmes, totalling some £180 million a year, is co-ordinated by the British national space centre, which comprises eight Government Departments, agencies and research councils.

British Coal

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether permission was (a) sought from the guarantor and (b) given by the guarantor for British Coal's action in appropriating the assets of the industrial death and retirement fund. [23515]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for the British Coal Corporation. I understand, however, that the industrial death and retirement scheme—it was not a fund—had no guarantor. British Coal retains the liability to meet all entitlements under the scheme, and informed my Department of its plans before the scheme closed in January 1995.

Life Assurance (Orphan Assets)

Mr. Darling: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received regarding his Department's policy on the disposal of orphan assets held by the life assurance industry: and if he will make a statement. [23995]

Mr. Nelson: My Department's general approach to this question was set out by my hon. Friend the then Minister for Corporate Affairs on 24 February 1995, Official Report, columns 362–63, in the context of an announcement by the United Friendly Insurance Co. about attribution of its estate. Since then, a number of life offices have announced that they are entering discussions with my Department over the attribution of their long-term funds. In addition, the Department has received representations from some 20 interested parties.

Mr. Darling: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the value of orphan assets currently held by the life assurance industry. [23996]

Mr. Nelson: A precise figure is not available. Any estimate is subject to a wide margin of error because of the differences in the circumstances of individual companies. In aggregate, the unattributed assets of long-term funds of proprietary life offices are likely to be of the order of £20 billion to £25 billion. I expect much of this to remain undistributed within the funds for the foreseeable future.

British Business (Cuba and United States)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action the British Government intend to take to ensure that British businesses are not adversely affected by the United States Cuba Liberty and Democratic Solidarity (Libertad) Act. [23077]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 27 March 1996]: The key provisions of this legislation are titles III and IV. Title III introduces a private right of action in the US courts for US nationals against non-US persons allegedly trafficking in property expropriated from US nationals in Cuba. Title IV excludes from the US any alien, including company officials and controlling shareholders, allegedly trafficking in confiscated property, a claim to which is owned by a US national.

The impact of the legislation on British business will depend on the way in which it is implemented by the US Administration and the US courts. The UK, the EU and other Governments have made a number of representations to the US authorities on the matter and the Government are considering what further action might be appropriate.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of the loan guaranteed by his Department to Porthocurno Management Co. Ltd. under the loan guarantee scheme in 1994 and the value of the guarantee that was assessed when the company was dissolved. [22569]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 25 March 1996]: This information is commercially confidential between the Department and the lender.

I can confirm the Department has paid a demand under the guarantee to the sum of £70,601.16.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EDS Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what out-sourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23726]

Mr. Hanley: The executive agencies of this Department have no contracts for software computer systems with EDS.

New York Assembly Bill

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by United Kingdom diplomats in the United States of America on the New York Assembly Bill, Ref. A6510/S4880, amending the education law in relation to instruction on genocide and mass starvation in Ireland from 1845 to 1850; and if he will make a statement. [23222]

Mr. Rifkind: None. The consulate-general in New York, who is monitoring the legislation closely, believes that this Bill is unlikely to pass into law.

BBC World Service

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the estimated audience for BBC World Service English language broadcasts in each of the 10 countries with most listeners; and from which 10 countries the most audience letters are annually received with the numbers involved. [23224]

Mr. Hanley: The estimated audiences for BBC World Service English language broadcasts are as follows:

Top 10 countries (excluding UK)

Country	Audience (millions)
Nigeria	7.5
India	5.5
USA	3.5
Australia	1.9
Ghana	1.1
Ethiopia	0.9
Kenya	0.9
Bangladesh	0.8
Germany	0.7
Uganda	0.7
Total	23.5

The UK domestic audience is estimated at 1.3 million.

The highest numbers of letters in 1995 were received from the following countries:

Country	Letters
India	172,000
Burma	78,700
Nigeria	32,400
Indonesia	29,000
China	25,800
Pakistan	19,000
Sri Lanka	10,800
Algeria	10,400
Egypt	9,800
Somalia[1]	3,500

[1] A further 4,000+ letters originated in Somalia but were posted via other countries, assisted by the Red Cross.

The World Service received 13,400 letters from the UK in 1995.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what would be the annual cost and the estimated savings involved in rebroadcasting BBC Home Service programmes on to the current schedule of the World Service or the proposed World Service news and current affairs channel; and if he will make a statement. [23225]

Mr. Hanley: Programme content is a matter for the BBC World Service. English language programmes are prepared for a global audience. Most listeners have English as a second language. Many have no first-hand knowledge of the UK. BBC Home Service programmes are meant for a UK audience, but the World Service uses them when appropriate.

The BBC has made no estimate of the cost of rebroadcasting domestic material since most of it is unsuitable for its global audience.

WEU (Irish Republic)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what commitments the Irish Republic was required to make in relation to territorial claims on fellow members of the Western European Union when it applied for observer status of that organisation; and if he will make a statement of the compatibility of such claims with the WEU's European defence policy. [23226]

Mr. Rifkind: The Rome declaration of 20 November 1992 on WEU observers, which recorded the invitation to the Republic of Ireland to become an observer, does not incorporate any such commitments. We do not regard the Irish constitutional position as incompatible with observer status in WEU.

Refugees (Croatia)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken to ensure the safe return of the refugee followers of Fikret Abdic from Kolaric in Croatia to their homes in Velika Kladusa; and what instructions have been given to United Kingdom forces in Bihac in respect of this matter. [23223]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: All but 5,900 followers of Fikret Abdic have returned to Bosnia. The rest remain in the Kuplensko refugee camp in Croatia. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Croatian authorities have decided to close the camp. Those who do not wish to return to Bosnia will be moved further away from the border until permanent arrangements for their future are worked out.

There are no British units based in Bihac.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23613]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

St. Helena

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which commercial bank applied for a banking licence on St. Helena prior to 1996; for what reasons it was not granted; and if he will make a statement. [23625]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The Bank of Nova Scotia applied for a banking licence in 1994, but subsequently withdrew its application.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the average gross annual income on the island of St. Helena of each quartile of those employed in (a) the private sector and (b) the public sector. [23626]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Information in the form requested cannot be extracted from the statistical data.

ENVIRONMENT

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for England and for each English local authority for the latest year for which figures are available (a) the number of contracts put out to competitive tender, (b) the number and percentage of those bids which were won by in-house teams, (c) the number and percentage of those bids won by other local authority-managed teams and (d) the number and percentage of those bids won by private companies; and what was the political control of each authority in the relevant year. [23380]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally. The Local Government Management Board publishes survey reports of its CCT information service which give information about eight areas of activity covered by the Local Government Act 1988. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Policy Planning Guidance

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the date he originally announced for the publication of the revised guidance PPG6; and when he now expects the guidance to be published. [23669]

Sir Paul Beresford: No date has been announced for the publication of the revised PPG6, but I expect to be in a position to publish in May.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received asking for publication of the revised PPG6. [23670]

Sir Paul Beresford: We have received no representations, but we have had a number of inquiries about the publication date.

Butchers (Rate Reduction)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if a reduction in uniform business rate will be made for butchers with stocks of unsold beef. [23768]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have no plans to make such a reduction.

Water Industry

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue his consultation paper on proposals for promoting greater competition in the water industry. [24287]

Mr. Gummer: I have today issued a consultation paper on extending competition and customer choice in water and sewerage services.

Competition is the best guarantee for consumers that they receive value for money, better services and lower prices. The Government are looking to increase progressively competition in the water industry within a strong regulatory framework designed to ensure effective protection and enhancement of water quality and the environment. The proposals in this consultation document, "Water—Increasing Customer Choice", mark an important step in this process.

In summary, the proposals which have been developed in consultation with the Director General of Water Services, would:

- Introduce scope for water suppliers to compete for customers through the shared use of water mains. This "common carriage" arrangement would involve the use of an existing supplier's pipework by other suppliers in order to provide individual customers with a choice of supplier. "Common carriage" opportunities would allow any existing water undertaker or new supplier to compete for "large users" with a view to extending competition to other customers in the future.
- Introduced safeguards to ensure that standards of water quality and reliability of supply are maintained and to enable the Director of Water Services to protect customers of the existing water undertakers.
- Introduce similar "common carriage" provisions in the sewerage industry.
- Extend the existing scope for "inset appointments" which allow a new water or waste water undertaker to be appointed to supply an area within an existing undertaker's area of appointment. Proposed changes would allow such appointment to be for limited periods only and increase the number of opportunities for their use.
- Remove the existing restrictions on cross-border supply to enable a water undertaker to supply water for non-domestic purposes to customers in the area of another licensed undertaker.
- Remove the water undertaker's monopoly on making connections to the water main.

The Director General of Water Services intends to issue a further consultation paper on the regulation of common carriage agreements.

Competition provides opportunities for customers to choose the combination of price and service which best meets their particular needs. Where such choice does not already exist, competition offers operators the opportunity to provide it where they believe it would be profitable to do so.

Copies of this consultation paper, on which comments are requested by 1 July 1996, have been placed in the Library.

Abattoir Waste

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what regulations exist to control disposal of waste from abattoirs (a) in water catchment areas, (b) in areas used for grazing and (c) adjacent to public rights of way; [23214]

(2) if the spreading of blood and gut contents on land will be brought within waste management regulations. [23237]

Mr. Clappison: The disposal of substances discarded as waste by abattoirs is controlled under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994. These controls also apply to such wastes which are recycled by spreading on land for the benefit of agriculture. The objective of these controls is to ensure that waste is disposed of, or recycled, without endangering human health or harming the environment. The Environment Agency is responsible from 1 April 1996 for the administration and enforcement of the waste management licensing system.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies have been carried out into potential human health risks associated with the distribution of abattoir waste (a) in water catchment areas, (b) in areas used for grazing and (c) adjacent to public rights of way. [23215]

Mr. Clappison: The Department, together with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the national Rivers Authority, is funding research to provide guidance on the landspreading of industrial wastes, including abattoir waste. A prime objective of the research is to provide technical, scientific and practical guidance on the spreading of industrial wastes on land in a manner that protects human health and the environment as required by article 4 of the waste framework directive 91/156/EEC.

The results of the research will be published by the Environment Agency.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what level of advice he receives from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food relating to the disposal of abattoir waste (a) in water catchment areas, (b) in areas used for grazing and (c) adjacent to public rights of way. [23216]

Mr. Clappison: The code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water, jointly prepared by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Welsh Office Agriculture Department, provides guidance on the application of wastes from animal processing to all types of agricultural land.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what monitoring takes places of the effectiveness of the code of good practice for the protection of water following the disposal of abattoir waste in water catchment areas. [23220]

Mr. Clappison: The spreading of waste on land for the benefit of agriculture or ecological improvement is a recovery operation for the purposes of the amended EC framework directive on waste; and is controlled under part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the Waste Management Licensing Regulations 1994. The objective of these controls is to ensure that waste is recovered without endangering human health or harming the environment.

It is an offence under section 33 of the 1990 Act to carry out this operation without a waste management licence or contrary to the conditions of a licence or a licence exemption. The administration and enforcement of the licensing system are the responsibility of waste regulation authorities whose functions are transferred to the Environment Agency with effect from 1 April 1996.

The National Rivers Authority also has statutory duties and powers to protect the aquatic environment from pollution and the authority is required to monitor water quality and investigate pollution incidents. The authority's functions are also transferred to the Environment Agency with effect from 1 April 1996.

Any pollution incidents that result from abattoir waste being spread in contravention of these controls will be taken into account when the "Code of Good Agricultural Practice for the Protection of Water" is reviewed.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23637]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23615]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Shopping Centres

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers are available to local authorities to enable them to maintain the competitiveness of town and city shopping centres against out-of-town shopping centres; and if he will make a statement. [24020]

Sir Paul Beresford: Local authorities can help by ensuring that the services for which they are responsible are delivered as effectively and efficiently as possible. This includes providing a clear planning framework and local plan that properly reflects the principles set out in PPG6—retailing and town centres—and PPG13—transport.

Environment Agency

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he has taken in respect of potential conflicts of interests for members of the board of the Environment Agency who are professionally engaged in industries that must be licensed by the agency with particular reference to the chairman of Ready Mixed Concrete. [23775]

Mr. Clappison: The statutory requirements in respect of agency board members' interests are set out in schedule 1 to the Environment Act 1995. Agency board members were required by their terms of appointment to abide by the Department's general guidance on the declaration and registration of interests—both financial and non-financial—until the agency had drawn up and issued its own guidance. The agency is required to draw up a code of practice for its board members, based on the Government's general code of best practice for board members of public bodies, for approval by the Department. This will incorporate guidance on the declaration and registration of interests.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further action is needed to implement Council directive 91/689/EEC as amended by 94/31/EC, the hazardous waste directive. [24369]

Mr. Clappison: The Special Waste Regulations 1996 were laid before Parliament today and will come into force on 1 September 1996 and implement Council directive No. 91/689/EEC on hazardous waste as amended by Council directive 94/31/EC. These regulations replace the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980.

The main provisions of the 1996 regulations are to:

- introduce new criteria for determining whether or not waste is special;
- require pre-notification of movements to the Environment Agency by consignment note;
- provide better descriptions of wastes and their associated hazards by means of a revised design for the consignment note;
- simplify arrangements for repetitive movements and collection rounds;
- ban mixing by carriers and consignees of categories of special wastes, and of special with non-special wastes, unless for safe disposal;
- require periodic inspections by regulators of special waste producers; and
- introduce fees for many consignments of special wastes.

The new regulations contain a number of deregulatory initiatives, designed to make the system easier to operate, while ensuring that special waste is soundly managed, and safely reaches appropriate facilities. Provisions include specific criteria for determining whether or not waste is special, to keep to a minimum the number of wastes which will be subject to these regulations, consistent with the overall aim of securing adequate levels of environmental protection.

These regulations also introduce fees, in line with the "polluter pays" principle, and to recover the costs incurred by the environment agencies for ensuring compliance with the regulations. A fee of £15 will be payable for most consignments. Consignments of automotive lead-acid batteries will attract a fee of £10 because they will be subject to lower levels of regulation.

Public consultation was carried out in March 1995 on the proposed regulations and accompanying guidance. The regulations have been modified to reflect the concerns and interests of industry, regulators and the public in response to those consultations. The Government are satisfied that these regulations will continue to ensure the environmentally sound management of special waste movements within Great Britain.

Waste Disposal Inquiry (Kent)

Dame Peggy Fenner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the report from the inspector involved in the public inquiry on Kent county council's waste disposal plan to be available. [23430]

Mr. Robert B. Jones [holding answer 29 March 1996]: The inspector's report on objections to the Kent waste local plan is expected to be issued to Kent county council in April 1996. It will be for the council to decide when to publish the report. I have asked the Planning Inspectorate's chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from D. E. John to Dame Peggy Fenner, dated 28 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for the Environment has asked me to reply to your question about the Inspector's report on objections to the Kent Waste Local Plan.

The report is expected to be issued to Kent County Council in April 1996. It will be for the Council to decide when to publish it.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Early-day Motions

Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the total annual cost to public funds of early-day motions. [23643]

Mr. Newton: Her Majesty's Stationery Office estimates that the total cost to public funds of producing EDMs in the Official Report, for the Session 1994–95, was £1,868,000.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what is the average number of signatures added to early-day motions per week. [23642]

Mr. Newton: The parliamentary on-line information service database records that, from 15 November 1995 until 26 March 1996, 28,842 signatures were added to EDMs over 77 sitting days, averaging 374.57 per day.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

HMSO

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what outstanding loans HMSO has; and from what source these loans come; [23251]

(2) what plans there are to extend or replace the HMSO service level agreement that is held with the Ministry of Defence; [23255]

(3) what service level agreements HMSO holds with other Government Departments; and which of these are due to expire during 1996; [23253]

(4) on what date the HMSO 1996 accounts are expected to be published. [23256]

(5) what is the value of goods and services supplied by HMSO under the Ministry of Defence service level agreement. [23254]

Mr. Freeman: As these are purely operational matters, I have asked the chief executive of HMSO to reply directly to the right hon. Member.

Letter from Mike Lynn to Mr. Derek Foster, dated 28 March 1996:

I have been asked by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to reply to your Parliamentary Questions Nos 140, 141, 142, 145 and 146. The information is as follows:

140. As at 26 March 1996, HMSO had one outstanding loan of £12m, advanced from the National Loans Fund.

141. New service agreements were signed with the MOD on 13 March 1996, for both office supplies and print. These agreements will run for two years.

145. HMSO normally publishes its Trading Fund Accounts at the end of April. Subject to audit, we expect to do the same this year.

146. In 1995, £25m of office stationery products and £11m of print were supplied to the MOD.

142. HMSO currently holds the following major service level agreements with other Government departments:

Customer	HMSO Business	Expiry date
Passport Agency	Security Print	1999
Benefits Agency	Security Print	1998
OPCS	Security Print	1997
Vehicle Inspectorate	Security Print	1999

Mr. Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when the House will be given full details of the information memorandum related to the proposed sale of HMSO. [23257]

Mr. Freeman: The information memorandum is a commercially sensitive document to which access is carefully controlled in order to protect HMSO's business and the interests of the Government in the sale process. I do not intend therefore to make the information memorandum generally available. However, in accordance with the undertaking which I gave to the Finance and Services Select Committee when I appeared before it on 21 November 1995, I shall provide the information memorandum to the Committee Clerk.

Mr. Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what leasehold and freehold properties are to be included with the proposed sale of HMSO. [23252]

Mr. Freeman: The intention is that all freehold and leasehold properties occupied by HMSO at the time of the sale, with the exception of suite B, St. Clement's house, should be included with the proposed sale.

Departmental Publications

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 26 February, Official Report, column 328, what was the cost of printing and distribution for the two booklets "Getting a Good Deal in Europe" and "Checking the Cost of Regulation"; and when he intends to distribute the remaining copies of these publications. [23640]

Mr. Freeman: The cost of printing the two booklets was:

"Getting a good deal in Europe . . . Deregulatory Principles in Practice"	8,062
"Checking the Cost of Regulation: A Guide to Compliance Cost Assessment"	8,666

The costs of distribution are not separately identified.

Current stocks are intended to last the lifetime of the booklets and are made freely available to officials throughout Government and to others with an interest as and when they are needed. I have also sent copies of the compliance cost assessment booklet to my ministerial counterparts in other member states.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23614]

Mr. Freeman: As I made clear in my response to my hon. friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) on 11 March, Official Report, columns 464–65, consultation on a draft statutory instrument setting out provisions for the model appeals mechanism is currently in progress. Copies of the consultation document have been placed in the Library and I have asked for replies by 11 May this year.

Under section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act, there will be only one model mechanism. This model will be considered for all appeals against enforcement action in appropriate legislation.

Property Advisers to the Civil Estate

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what targets he has set for Property Advisers to the Civil Estate on its creation as an executive agency in his Department. [24354]

Mr. Freeman: PACE has today been established as an executive agency in the Office of Public Service. Its main aims are to enable Departments to achieve best overall value for money in the management of their property assets, by providing advisory and co-ordination services, and to carry out residual functions of disposing of inherited vacant property and collecting opportunity cost rents. I have set performance targets for its first year 1996–97:

(i) to identify savings from proposals to be agreed with Departments for the co-ordination of property activities on the civil estate which in total should exceed the agency's related running costs;

(ii) to recover 100 per cent. of the costs of providing intelligent client services;

(iii) to contain expenditure on vacant properties within an annual net provision of £110 million;

(iv) to recover 100 per cent. of opportunity cost rents due;

(v) to recover 100 per cent. of the costs of the Whitehall district heating system.

I have today placed copies of the agency's framework document in the Library of the House.

Chessington Computer Centre

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what key targets have been set for the Chessington Computer Centre trading fund for the current financial year. [24353]

Mr. Freeman: My primary objective for Chessington Computer Centre is to implement its privatisation this summer. However, until that is achieved, Chessington will be managed with the following key targets for 1996–97:

(1) to achieve an operating surplus of £223,000;

(2) to increase pay clerk productivity by 7 per cent. over 1995–96 performance;

(3) to increase use of the on-line data capture system (SPIRE) to 60 per cent. for a new major customer;

(4) to maintain the minimum on-line service availability at 98.5 per cent.

Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made with the establishment of the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency as a next steps executive agency. [24355]

Mr. Freeman: I am pleased to announce that I have today established the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency as a next steps executive agency. The arrangements for CCTA are fully described in its framework document, copies of which will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

The purpose of CCTA is to improve the delivery of public services by developing, maintaining and making available, expertise about information technology which public sector organisations will draw on in order to operate more effectively and efficiently.

I have set CCTA the following targets for 1996–97:

to break even on a accruals basis after taking into account payments from the Office of Public Service in relation to transitional costs and the provision of "common good" services, and to operate within PES and supply estimates provision; to secure and provide procurement services and best practice consultancy to the value of at least £6.2 million on a full cost recovery basis; to secure and provide telecommunications services to the value of £11.6 million; to establish, validate and to have approved ready for implementation for 1997–98 quantified performance measures for the financial, quality of service, customer satisfaction and efficiency aspects of the agency's performance.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Consultative Group for Kenya

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Paris meeting of the consultative group for Kenya. [23151]

Mr. Hanley: The consultative group for Kenya met at the invitation of the World bank in Paris on 21 to 22 March. Donors welcomed recent positive developments in Kenya's economic policies and the publication of a new policy framework paper, while underlining the importance of a range of good governance issues. The UK announced the immediate release of £5.1 million of programme aid, to support civil service reforms. A copy of the World bank's press statement has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

St. Helena

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the St. Helena tourism bureau commenced operations; what is its annual budget; and how many (a) local and (b) non-island staff it employs. [23624]

Mr. Hanley: No tourism bureau exists on St. Helena. A consultancy visit in the near future arranged by the World Tourism Organisation, under United Nations Development Programme auspices, will help advise the St. Helena Government on future arrangements for tourism development.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many copies of "Investing in St. Helena" were printed on behalf of the St. Helena development agency; at what total production cost; how and where they were distributed; and if he will make a statement. [23801]

Mr. Hanley: Some 1,000 copies of the booklet were produced at a total production cost of £2,891. Copies were sent to UK chambers of commerce; South Africa chambers of commerce; individuals and companies that had previously expressed an interest in investment in St. Helena; and to the UK representative of St. Helena.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

35. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what percentage of the people of the British Isles were capable of qualifying for legal aid in 1966; what is the latest corresponding figure; and if he will make a statement. [21927]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Department has no estimates of eligibility for 1966. The Department's estimate of the proportion of households in England and Wales currently eligible for civil legal aid is 48 per cent.

37. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent representations he has received about legal aid in civil cases. [21929]

Mr. Evans: I have received many representations recently on legal aid in civil cases.

40. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applications for legal aid over £10,000 have been awarded by the Legal Aid Board during the past five years; and if he will make a statement. [21932]

Mr. Evans: Information prior to 1993–94 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The number of civil legal aid certificates where the Legal Aid Board paid gross costs in excess of £10,000 for the following years was as follows:

1994–95: 7,346.

In addition, the Legal Aid Board paid gross costs of over £10,000 for criminal legal aid in the magistrates courts as follows.

1994–95: 389.

The Legal Aid Board is not responsible for payment of legal aid bills for work done in the higher criminal courts. Those bills are paid directly by the Lord Chancellor's Department and it is estimated that in 1993—94 and 1994–95, the Department paid gross costs of over £10,000 for criminal legal aid in the higher courts as follows:

1993–94: 3,125

1994–95: 3,500.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the operations of the Legal Aid Board. [21935]

Mr. Evans: The day-to-day operations of the Legal Aid Board are a matter for its chief executive. The board's annual report, which sets out its performance, is available in the House Library.

Dr. Spink: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the (a) gross cost and (b) net cost of the legal aid fund in (i) 1979, (ii) 1989 and (iii) the last year for which figures are available. [23161]

Mr. Evans: The gross and net costs of the legal aid fund in 1979–80, 1989–90 and 1994–95, being the latest year for which figures are available are:

£ million

	Gross cost	Net cost
1979–80	124	98
1989–90	716	565
1994–95	1,598	1,299

Judicial Vacancies

36. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proportion of judicial vacancies were advertised in 1995. [21928]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Over half the appointments to the full-time professional judiciary in 1995 were made following either advertisement or notice to eligible candidates where eligibility is restricted. The equivalent figure for the part-time professional judiciary was about 20 per cent.

Magistrates Courts

38. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent representations he has received on the working of the magistrates courts. [21930]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I receive frequent representations on the working of the magistrates courts.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

39. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what advice he has given to judges in respect of dealing with cases in which a public interest immunity certificate relating to the suppression of evidence has been issued. [21931]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: None. Decisions on such claims are matters solely for the courts.

Family Law Bill

41. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what have been the principal issues which were raised in representations to him about the Family Law Bill during March. [21933]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I received representations on the Family Law Bill on a number of issues during March. The principal issues were: reconciliation and support for marriage, the use of allegations of fault, the professional competence of mediators, the influence of conduct on financial settlements and the timing of finance and property orders.

Advice and Representations to HM the Queen

42. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are his responsibilities in respect of (a) giving advice and (b) making representations to Her Majesty the Queen in her private capacity. [21934]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 4 March 1996, Official Report, column 73.

Community Care Policy

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what information his Department collates on judicial reviews of community care policy. [24155]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Alan Milburn, dated 1 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to the above question about judicial reviews of community care policy.

Statistics on judicial review relate only to the total number of cases. No separate information is collated on judicial review of community care policy.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Sickness Rates

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of regional variations in sickness rates (a) in the civil service, (b) elsewhere in the public sector and (c) in other employment. [22377]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following table gives an assessment of regional variations in sickness rates in the civil service. The Department has not made an assessment of sickness rates for elsewhere in the public sector or in other employment.

Sickness Absence in the Civil Service 1994: CS Occupational Health and Safety Agency Report

Average working days absence per staff-year by region.

Region	Unadjusted		Adjusted
	1993	1994	1993	1994
North West	11.8	11.2	10.5	10.6
Scotland	11.7	10.1	10.9	10.0
Wales	11.2	10.0	9.4	9.3
North East	11.2	9.7	9.9	8.9
West Midlands	9.4	8.9	8.6	8.5
Northern Ireland	9.2	9.4	8.5	8.4
South East	8.9	8.1	8.7	8.3
Yorkshire and Humberside	9.3	8.3	8.6	8.1
East Midlands	9.2	8.5	8.3	8.0
South West	8.3	7.5	7.9	7.4
East Anglia	8.5	7.6	7.9	7.3
Civil Service average	10.1	8.9	—	—

Having adjusted for the factors affecting sickness absence which have been considered earlier in this Report (age, gender and grade level), there remain substantial differences between regions. The North West has the highest rate of absence of all Regions, followed by Scotland and Wales. East Anglia and the South West were clearly the regions of lowest absence.

Information Technology

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much money has been made available for each year since 1990 for information technology initiatives (a) for initial teacher training and (b) in schools; and if she will make a statement. [22556]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has given a central lead to the development of information technology in schools since the early 1980s. It is not possible to isolate the initial teacher training element.

The main source of the Department's financial support is provided through the grants for education support and training programme. The specific GEST allocations for IT in schools in the five years from 1990–91 to 1994–95 were: £19.8 million, £30.4 million, £30 million, £30 million, and £21.9 million.

In 1995–96 and 1996–97 support for IT in schools continues to be available through the school effectiveness GEST programme. Eligible expenditure, which attracts grant at the rate of 60 per cent., includes IT equipment, upgrades and software, the installation of networking, the cost of teacher training provision and the employment of IT advisory teachers.

Over the period from 1990–91 to 1995–96, the Department has also separately made available funding in excess of £22 million to pilot new technologies; to stimulate software development focused on the needs of the national curriculum; to provide additional funding to equip many schools with multimedia technologies, and to support the development of the effective use of IT in individual curriculum subjects, the primary phase and with children with special educational needs.

In addition, the Department has made an annual grant available, in the region of £5 million per annum, to support the work of the National Council for Educational Technology to help schools use IT effectively for curriculum and administrative purposes.

Community Self-build Schemes

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in what circumstances unemployed benefit recipients who are engaged in community self-build housing schemes from October 1996, will be required to limit their self-build participation to (a) 21 hours and (b) 16 hours in a week; and if the figures will be the same for (i) those carrying out self-build work on a voluntary basis, (ii) self-builders participating in training and enterprise council-funded training programmes and (iii) those participating in European social fund-funded programmes. [23058]

Mr. Forth: The Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations 1996 make no special provisions for people who participate in self-build housing schemes. To be entitled to JSA all jobseekers must be available for and actively seeking employment, and not in remunerative work for 16 hours or more per week as defined in the JSA regulations. The current approach in income support that those involved in self-build schemes will not usually be treated as engaged in remunerative work will be carried forward into JSA. Each claim from a jobseeker who participates in a self-build scheme will be considered on the individual facts of the case.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the number of students in further and higher education in the United Kingdom; and what is the current ratio of school leavers to the number entering higher education. [23249]

Mr. Forth: The numbers of enrolments in further—excluding adult education centres—and higher education in the UK in 1994–95 are provisionally estimated to be 2,573,000 and 1,701,000, respectively.

Information on the numbers of school leavers who entered higher education directly is not readily available. In some cases, progression to HE will be direct from further education or tertiary college, and some students will enter after a year abroad or other sabbatical. The available information on entrants to HE by age is given in the following table:

Age[1]	Number of entrants[2] to HE in UKs in 1994–95 (000)
18 years and under	154
19 years	87
20 years and over	561
All ages	802

[1] Age at 31 August.
[2] Provisional. Includes Open university.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if she will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps she is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23634]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burden when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, she expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23617]

Mr. Forth: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the number of temporary exclusions from schools in each year since 1979. [24026]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the number of permanent school exclusions for each year since 1979. [24024]

Mr. Squire: The Department is this year collecting, for the first time, systematic data on permanent exclusions from all maintained schools, through the annual schools census return issued in January. Comprehensive data on permanent exclusions in the school year 1994–95 will thus be available in the autumn.

Prior to this, information was collected on an ad hoc basis. Data on permanent exclusions from maintained schools in England were assembled by the Department over a two year period, starting with the summer term 1990, under the national exclusions reporting system. Some 2,910 permanent exclusions were reported in the first year and 3,833 in the second.

A survey conducted by Christ Church college, Canterbury on behalf of the Department and published in July last year, showed that there were 10,624 permanent exclusions in the school year 1993–94 in the 101 local education authorities in England which responded to the researchers' questionnaire out of a total of 109 LEAs. It also showed there were 4,550 permanent exclusions in the autumn term 1994 in 101 LEAs.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many children in care of the local authority have been excluded from school in each year since 1979. [24025]

Mr. Squire: This information is not available centrally.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the current benefit sanction on claimants failing to attend 1-2-1 interviews; and what sanctions will apply under the jobseeker's allowance. [24152]

Mr. Forth: Under current legislation any jobseeker who fails to attend 1-2-1 interviews when required will be disallowed benefit until such time as he does attend. Under jobseeeker's allowance any jobseeker who fails to attend a 1-2-1 interview without good cause will face a fixed period sanction of two weeks' loss of JSA. If he has received an earlier sanction within the previous 12 months, the fixed period may be four weeks' loss of JSA. Depending on the circumstances of the jobseeker, he may be able to receive hardship payments of JSA during the period of sanction.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if regulation 9 of the Job Seeker's Allowance Regulations 1996 will allow claimants who satisfy all other availability conditions to restrict their availability for employment during the first six months of a claim. [24156]

Mr. Forth: Jobseekers may place restrictions on the nature of the employment for which they are available, the terms or conditions of employment, including the rate of remuneration, and the locality in which they are looking for employment provided that they can show that they have reasonable prospects of securing employment despite those restrictions. Regulation 9 imposes a six-month limit on any restriction to do with the rate of remuneration. There is no limit to other areas of restriction, although an adjudication officer may take into account the length of time a jobseeker has been unemployed when determining whether a jobseeker continues to retain reasonable propects of securing employment with the restrictions he has imposed.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the new 13-week qualifying period for employment on trial of claimants of JSA will take into account any period of unemployment preceding 7 October 1996. [24154]

Mr. Forth: Yes. Jobseekers can take advantage of employment on trial if they have been unemployed for a continuous period of 13 weeks falling before the start of the job. Jobseekers will not have to have been in receipt of benefit during this period in order to qualify. The reduction in the qualifying period to 13 weeks represents a significant improvement in the provision enabling more people to try out an unfamiliar job without fear of losing benefit later if they decide to give up the job.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in what order the jobsearcher's plan and jobseeker's agreement will be completed by claimants of JSA; what additional forms will have to be completed by those entitled to income related JSA and passported benefits; and at what intervals the jobseeker's agreement will be reviewed by Employment Service staff. [24153]

Mr. Forth: New claimants to jobseeker's allowance will be asked to complete a "helping you back to work" form—formerly referred to as the jobsearch plan form—to help them prepare for an interview to agree a jobseeker's agreement. The jobseeker's agreement may be reviewed at each fortnightly attendance and advisory interview, and will be varied as necessary.

Jobseekers who claim income-based JSA and wish to claim housing benefit and council tax benefit will also be required to compete forms NHB1 (HB) and NHBI (CBT), as they are currently required to do, in addition to the JSA claim form. Existing arrangements for claiming benefits from other Departments will be carried forward into JSA.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has for Employment Service staff to take adjudication decisions on benefit sanctions against claimants of JSA. [24149]

Mr. Forth: All labour market adjudication decisions in JSA, including those where a benefit sanction is appropriate, will be taken by adjudication officers employed by the Employment Service. Adjudication officers act independently of the Secretary of State.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment at what intervals claimants of JSA will have to attend compulsory advisory interviews; and if the existing pattern of compulsory six-monthly restart interviews will be maintained. [24151]

Mr. Forth: Jobseekers will have to attend advisory interviews when they make a new claim, when they have been unemployed for 13 weeks, or earlier if that has been agreed with the jobseeker, and when they have been unemployed for six months—the existing pattern of six-monthly restart interviews will be maintained.

Jobseekers will also have a short review when they attend the jobcentre every fortnight. If, as a result of those reviews, it is decided that a more in-depth advisory interview is appropriate, one will be arranged. Failure to attend any interview as required may lead to the loss of JSA.

This pattern of interviews will, of course, be reviewed from time to time in the light of changing circumstances.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals he has to enable all unemployed people on Government employment and training programmes to count participation in these towards the three-month qualification period for undertaking part-time education as specified in regulation 11 of Jobseeker's Allowance Regulations. [24147]

Mr. Forth: Jobseekers who claim jobseeker's allowance will be able to study part time so long as they remain available for and actively seeking employment.

There will be an additional concession for certain jobseekers, where no aspect of their study will be taken into account when deciding whether they are available for work if they are willing and able to rearrange their course to take a job within the hours that they have agreed in their jobseeker's agreement they will be available for work. Those who have been in receipt of JSA or certain other benefits for broadly three months or more in the last six will qualify for this concession. Such people may also have been participating in Government programmes. Attendance for an appropriate period on a Government employment and training programme aimed primarily at 16 and 17-year-olds will also qualify a jobseeker for this concession.

Part-time Study

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in which areas and when the new approaches on part-time study arrangements will be piloted; and what particular aspects will be covered. [24148]

Mr. Forth: Once jobseeker's allowance has been established, we shall decide whether to pilot different arrangements for jobseekers who wish to study while claiming JSA.

Humanities Courses

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the proportion of males to females on humanities courses in British higher education. [24016]

Mr. Forth: The proportion of all female enrolments on humanities courses in UK higher education in 1994–95 was 52.2 per cent.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 485, about grant-maintained schools, what is or will be the cost for each case listed; what is the cost in total; and if she will make a statement. [23903]

Mrs. Gillan: The following amounts of annual maintenance grant paid to grant-maintained schools in 1995–96 have not been recouped from the local education authority named:

Alder Coppice primary school, Dudley	24,005
The Arnewood school, Hampshire	195,687
Bourne Abbey primary school, Lincolnshire	39,412
The Burgate school, Hampshire	117,765
Chellaston school, Derbyshire	150,765
Costessey high school, Norfolk	63,579
The Ellowes Hall school, Dudley	29,512
The Greensward school, Essex	233,206
Greenwood Dale school, Nottinghamshire	82,596
Heanor Gate school, Derbyshire	71,711
Holy Trinity CE primary school, Kent	19,688
Katherine's primary school, Essex	28,449
Merrill college, Debyshire	71,776
Ringwood comprehensive school, Hampshire	141,142
St. Anselm's college and Upton Hall convent school, Wirral (in total)	1,043,581
St. Peter and St. Paul RC high school, Lincolnshire	29,528
Sheringham high school, Norfolk	45,035
Wold Newton primary school, Humberside	20,194
Woodnewton Way infant school, Northamptonshire	40,894

Amounts of non-recoupable annual maintenance grant for 1995–96 have not been finalised in respect of Appleby primary school, Cumbria, and Eaglesfield Paddle CE primary school, Cumbria.

Job Clubs

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what are the forecast savings to the Employment Service of closing down the afternoon session of the Liverpool and Wirral executive job club; [24144]

(2) when the Liverpool and Wirral executive job club opened. [24145]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Frank Field, dated 1 April 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your two written questions concerning the forecast saving to the Employment Service (ES) by the closure of the afternoon session of the Liverpool and Wirral Executive Jobclub, and the date the Jobclub opened. I am responding to both questions in this reply.

The ES continually monitors its network of programme providers to ensure the quality of provision, and that this network offers adequate coverage for its clients.

With the continuing fall in eligible clients numbers throughout the Wirral and the region as a whole the ES has to ensure that its providers of services offer value for money.

Forecasts of savings to the ES of the closure of any programme sites are not made. This is in part due to the financial system of payment agreed with the provider at the contracting stage. I can say that the total Jobclub budget allocation for the Wirral ES District for the 1995/96 financial year is £383,102.

Where a decision is made to close a particular programme site, every effort is made to find alternative programme provision, where possible, for the remaining clients.

Wirral Executive Jobclub opened in October 1994 with both morning and afternoon sessions and it is planned to close the afternoon session from the 1 June. However the morning Jobclub session will remain open, thus maintaining an Executive Jobclub within the area.

I hope this is helpful.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what measures her Department is taking to fulfil its obligations to the unemployed as outlined in the jobseeker's charter in the Liverpool and Wirral area; [24143]

(2) if she will make a statement on the minimum number of hours a job club should be open under the jobseeker's charter. [24142]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Frank Field, dated 1 April 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your two written questions concerning the minimum number of hours a Jobclub is required to remain open, and what steps the ES is taking to ensure its obligations are met under the Jobseeker's Charter in the Liverpool and Wirral area.

As both questions relate to the Jobseekers Charter I am responding to both questions in this reply.

The Jobseeker's Charter sets out obligations both of the Employment Service (ES) to deliver services, and of its clients. It informs jobseekers about the standards of service they can expect when visiting or calling ES offices or using its services, the help we provide, and what we expect from our clients. It is a valuable medium to demonstrate to jobseekers and others that we as an organisation are committed to looking at the services we provide, and that we actively seek to improve our standards, where possible. As part of this process, complaints about our services and suggestions for improving them are encouraged and welcomed.

As well as recording suggestions and complaints, the ES currently monitors performance on a quarterly basis against five standards of service set out in its Jobseeker's Charter. These are:

Telephone answering times (within 30 seconds);

Waiting times (Clients to be seen within 10 minutes);

Answering correspondence (replies to written correspondence within 5 working days);

Currency of vacancies (during a sample week);

Speed and accuracy of payments;

There are no separate set of standards for ES programmes or the providers who run them. However, programme providers are obliged to accept the standards set out in the Jobseeker's Charter, and are monitored locally to see that the standards are adhered to and that the achievement of standards are publicised locally.

Jobclubs are normally open for 12 hours per week, although they do not form part of the Jobseeker's Charter standards. However, these hours can be modified according to local circumstances and through the contractual agreement the ES has with the Jobclub provider.

I hope this is helpful.

Teachers' Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the future administration of the teachers' superannuation scheme in England and Wales. [24471]

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has decided to let a seven-year contract for the administration of teachers' pensions in England and Wales to Capita Managed Services Ltd. This will give savings to the taxpayer of about £20 million over the life of the contract.

We have consistently said that we will let a contract to the private sector only if it can be proved that it will give better value for money than keeping the administration of the teachers' superannuation scheme in the public sector. Capita Managed Services is committed to providing the high standards of service and performance that we have demanded, and has a record of doing so in other contracts. Capita will take over the administration of teachers' pensions on 1 October 1996.

Capita has declared its intention to maintain the administration of the TSS in Darlington. It is committed to a business growth strategy on the Darlington site. This commitment to Darlington, together with the transfer of the staff of the Teachers' Pensions Agency under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 offers the staff of the agency good prospects for the future.

The contract with Capita will concern only the administration of the TSS. The scheme itself will stay in the public sector, on its current statutory basis, and teachers' pensions will not be affected in any way. My right hon. Friend will remain responsible to Parliament for the scheme. Officials in the Department for Education and Employment will be responsible for advising Ministers on policy on teachers' pensions.

Research

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what additional support has been given to research within higher education institutions in the areas of sensor, data fusion and data processing technology since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23692]

Mr. Forth: Higher Education Funding Council for England funding for research is not earmarked but distributed as part of block grant which higher education institutions allocate at their discretion. It is for institutions themselves to decide what additional support to give to research in sensor, data fusion and data processing technology in the light of technology foresight findings.

TRANSPORT

New Roads

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many miles of new road are planned to be constructed using the design, build, finance and operate initiative under contracts (a) already let, (b) due to be let in 1996 and (c) forecast to be let by 2000. [19687]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 1 April 1996:

I have been asked by the Secretary of State for Transport to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about how many miles of new road are planned to be constructed under the design, build, finance and operate initiative under contracts (a) already let, (b) due to be let in 1996 and (c) forecast to be let by 2000.

Forty nine miles have already been let, thirty five miles are due to be let in 1996 and; the forecast for the year 2000 is sixty six miles.

United Kingdom Fleet (British Ratings)

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what financial aid has been given to the United Kingdom fleet to encourage the employment of British ratings. [21748]

Mr. Norris: Government assistance for training—GAFT—is paid in respect both of ratings and cadets under 18 on approved training courses. GAFT's total budget, including youth training funding, is £3.4 million a year.

The crew relief costs scheme makes grants towards the cost of flying British seafarers to and from distant ports. The scheme, which applies equally to British ratings and officers, has a budget of £2 million a year.

More generally, Government policies are designed to improve the competitive position of British shipping, providing career opportunities for British ratings and officers.

Rail Safety

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what procedures exist for staff of contractors to Railtrack to be designated as safety critical, as defined by the Hidden recommendations. [23117]

Mr. Watts: Sir Anthony Hidden QC, in his report on the investigation of the Clapham junction collision, made no recommendation defining safety critical staff.

The Railways (Safety Critical Work) Regulations 1994 place duties on employers relating to "safety critical work", which is defined as certain work which could affect the health and safety of persons on a transport system.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis compensation is paid to train operators for delays in safety certification of locomotives and rolling stock. [23115]

Mr. Watts: It is for the train operating companies to demonstrate to Railtrack that they are in compliance with railway group standards. Compensation is not an issue.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what steps Railtrack and the Health and Safety Executive are taking to ensure that infrastructure maintenance staff are not working on a series of contracts concurrently for different infrastructure owners for which the aggregate time worked exceeds the maximum number of permitted hours or days as stipulated by Sir Anthony Hidden QC in his report and inquiry into the Clapham rail disaster; [23121]

(2) what procedures exist to ensure that contractors of Railtrack comply with the Hidden recommendations on maximum working hours for safety critical staff; [23120]

Mr. Watts: Sir Anthony Hidden QC, in his report on the investigation of the Clapham junction collision, made no recommendations as to the maximum number of permitted hours or days to be worked by infrastructure maintenance staff.

In the Railways (Safety Critical Work) Regulations 1994, a duty is placed upon employers to ensure so far as is reasonably practicable that no employee undertakes safety critical work for such number of hours as would be liable to cause fatigue which could endanger safety. This duty applies to the employer irrespective of the location of the work undertaken. Railtrack's railway safety case states that particular attention will be given to monitoring the safety performance of contractors including compliance with relevant standards of legislation.

The Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate enforces the regulations by checking employer's safety management systems and records, in the course of certain inspections and accident investigations, and by investigating complaints of excessive hours by employees.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what targets he has set Railtrack for giving safety approval to train operators; and what sanctions are available in the event of unreasonable delay. [23116]

Mr. Watts: No targets have been set for Railtrack.

As regards railway safety gases, a train operator may submit a safety case, or revision, for acceptance to the Secretary of State if Railtrack either refuses to accept it or fails to accept it within a reasonable time.

As regards safety cases for rolling stock, defined procedures exist for new or revised railway group standards. Where proposals have been rejected, appeals can be made to the Rail Regulator, who will consult the Health and Safety Executive in reaching his decision.

Under Railtrack's network licence, the primary safety purpose of the railway group standards code is subject to the need to promote business planning, efficiency, economy and competition, and the need to impose the minimum restrictions which are consistent with safe operation.

Travelcards

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will take action to ensure that the agreement reached by the London Committee on Accessible Transport, representing London boroughs and the relevant transport providers, for a seven-year contract for providing senior citizens travelcards in Greater London is approved by the British Railways Board. [23406]

Mr. Norris: This is a matter for the British Railways Board. The board has decided that it would be inappropriate for the board to commit, as yet unknown, private sector franchise operators to a seven-year concessionary fares scheme in London. A 12-month agreement, as suggested by the board, will ensure the continuation of this popular concessionary scheme on the same terms as before and allow franchise operators to take part in discussions about the arrangements for a long-term scheme.

Four-wheel Drive Vehicles

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation banning the use of four-wheel drive vehicles on green roads; and if he will make a statement. [23542]

Mr. Steven Norris: The Government announced in the rural White Paper, Cm 3016, that, while they were not yet convinced of the case for general legislation to restrict the use of byways by motorised vehicles, they would discuss the situation with interested parties. I hope to issue a consultation document, jointly with the Department of the Environment, in late spring or early summer.

Hydrographic Surveys (Welsh Estuaries)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to ensure that sand banks or barriers in the estuaries of Wales are recharted following the grounding of the Sea Empress. [23802]

Mr. Norris: My Department keeps the need for hydrographic surveys under review through the Marine Safety Agency's advisory committee on shipping hydrography, which comprises representatives of the shipping industry, the General Lighthouse Authorities, the port associations, and professional hydrographers from the Royal Navy. We will consider the need for any surveys or recharting off the coast of Wales if the marine accidents investigation branch investigation into the Sea Empress recommends that we should do so.

Hop-on Hop-off Buses

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects a fiche d'impact on the EC bus and coach directive to be produced; and what other EU countries have hop-on hop-off buses in commission in their capital cities. [23604]

Mr. Norris: We are currently awaiting a proposal for the EC bus and coach directive, along with the fiche d'impact from the Commission, but the timing of this is not known.

We are not aware of any other EU countries which operate open platform buses in their capital cities.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) deaths, (b) serious injuries and (c) minor injuries have resulted from passengers falling from open-platform double-decker buses in each of the last 10 years; how many complaints he has received in the last 10 years of the dangers of hop-on hop-off buses; and if he will make a statement. [23606]

Mr. Norris: The data available from the Department's Vehicle Inspectorate indicate that the number of fatalities arising from people falling from open platform double-decker buses for each of the 10 years from 1985 to 1994 were 2, 1, 1, 2, 0, 1, 0, 0, 1, 1 respectively. Information collated by London Transport for 1995 is one fatality, 17 serious and 382 slight injuries. Corresponding information on serious and slight injuries for previous years is not available.

The Department receives representations on a variety of bus issues but the dangers of open platform buses have not featured highly in these.

Driving Licences

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many EU member states have invoked grandfather rights when implementing the second EC directive on driving licences 91/439/EEC; and if he will make a statement on his reasons for not doing so. [23699]

Mr. Norris: According to our current information, no member states have perpetuated or are proposing to perpetuate, "grandfather rights" in respect of eyesight requirements for lorry and bus drivers, but we are seeking detailed updated information from the relevant national authorities. The reason for proposing to discontinue grandfather rights is the need to ensure the highest sensible standards of road safety in the United Kingdom.

M1-A1

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to award the design, build, finance and operate scheme for the M1-A1 link; and if he will make a statement. [23607]

Mr. Watts: The design, build, finance and operate—DBFO—contract for the M1-A1 Yorkshire link project was awarded to Yorkshire Link Ltd. on 26 March 1996.

This is the largest and most complex DBFO the Department has awarded to date. This new motorway will take away from congested routes through Leeds and will improve access to industrial areas in the south-east of the city. Moreover, there is expected to be major reduction in road traffic accidents—more than 150 accidents a year should be prevented over the next 30 years.

The Department is making excellent progress with DBFO, with contracts now awarded for each of the first four DBFO projects first announced back in August 1994. This success shows the DBFO offers advantages to the construction industry, the road user and the taxpayer.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23632]

Mr. Watts: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23620]

Mr. Watts: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

SCOTLAND

Public Bodies

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list each executive non-departmental public body which will become operational in Scotland on 1 April; and if he will make a statement. [23795]

Mr. Kynoch: The information is as follows:

Scottish Children's Reporter Administration

Scottish Environment Protection Agency

Scottish Water and Sewerage Customers Council.

The Scottish Environment Protection Agency replaced the seven existing river purification boards, each of which is an executive NDPB. As from today, 1 April, the number of executive NDPBs operational in Scotland is 40, as compared with 60 in 1979.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each of the non-departmental bodies for which he is responsible (a) the number of board members, (b) the number of allowances being paid, (c) the total cost of these allowances, (d) the cost per board member and (e) the numbers of administrative and executive staff earning in excess of £42,000. [23974]

Mr. Kynoch: The information requested in (a) to (d) is available in, or can be derived from, the Scottish Office section for the annual Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies". The information at (e) is not held centrally.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those of his Department's advisory non-departmental public bodies which (a) the Government are required to consult prior to legislative proposals and (b) the Government are required to publish their response to advice supplied by them. [21863]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 21 March 1996]: The information requested is:

(a) Scottish Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council

Building Standards Advisory Committee

Police Advisory Board for Scotland

General Teaching Council for Scotland.

(b) General Teaching Council for Scotland.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23622]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

DEFENCE

Ministry of Defence Police

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about defence agency status for the Ministry of Defence police. [24413]

Mr. Soames: The Ministry of Defence police is to be established as an agency of the Ministry of Defence on 1 April 1996.

The MDP is a fully constituted police force acting under the Ministry of Defence Police Act 1987. The headquarters and police and guard service training schools are at Wethersfield in the county of Essex. Detachments are employed throughout the United Kingdom, based primarily at Ministry of Defence establishments.

The MDP provides a civil policing service where required throughout the Ministry of Defence. It also provides a security service, including armed guarding at important defence installations. Its activities cover the protection of life, prevention of crime, detection of offenders, and the maintenance of order on, or in connection with, defence property and personnel. In its policing role it operates entirely independently of political or departmental influence in the maintenance and operation of the law.

As the first chief executive, the chief constable, Mr. W. E. E. Boreham OBE, will be offered new opportunities to build on the current organisation's professional expertise and high performance standards. Through the greater delegations and authority afforded by agency status, the chief constable will actively seek to improve the efficiency and value for money of his police force.

The chief constable has been set the following key targets for the first year of operation:

(1) By 1 April 1997 to have identified and implemented agreed performance measures of force activity.

(2) To improve significantly upon the baseline achieved in the first customer satisfaction survey.

(3) By 1 October 1996 to make proposals for funding arrangements for national, additional, or cross top-level budget boundary commitments.

(4) By 1 July 1996 to complete the evaluation of the effectiveness of the new force structure introduced from 1 April 1995.

(5) To achieve efficiency savings prescribed within the departmental management and efficiency plans.

(6) To develop efficiency measurement systems in order to provide a coherent efficiency plan incorporating a detailed competing for quality programme and be innovative in the identification of opportunities afforded by co-operation with industry.

Milestones:

(a) To set up agreed mechanisms for medium to long-term manpower planning.

(b) To implement the information systems strategy to time, quality and specification.

The owner of the Ministry of Defence Police agency will be the second permanent under-secretary of state at the Ministry of Defence.

The chief constable will produce an annual report which, for financial year 1997–98, will contain accruals-based accounts. These will be presented to Parliament. I have also arranged for copies of the agency's framework document to be placed in the Library of the House.

Trident

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money to date has been committed by his Department to the purchase of Trident D5 missiles from the United States of America. [23609]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department has, to date, committed £853 million, at outturn prices, toward the purchase of Trident D5 missiles from the United States of America.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the in-service dates of the Trident submarines. [23610]

Mr. Arbuthnot: HMS Vanguard entered service in December 1994 and HMS Victorious in December 1995. Vigilant will enter service in 1998 and Vengeance around the turn of the century.

Government Contracts (Review Report)

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the report by the review board for Government contracts on its 1996 general review of the profit formula for non-competitive Government contracts. [24470]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Government have accepted the overall target rate of return on capital employed as recommended by the review board in its report. The new rate will be 19.3 per cent. compared with the current rate of 18.5 per cent., both on the basis of historic costs. It will be effective from 1 April this year. The report has been printed and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Unoccupied Dwellings

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Hertfordshire; [23900]

(2) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Surrey; [23899]

(3) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in East Sussex; [23897]

(4) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Greater London; [23893]

(5) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in the Isle of Man; [23901]

(6) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Gwent; [23860]

(7) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Powys; [23865]

(8) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Gwynedd; [23869]

(9) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Durham; [23873]

(10) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Merseyside; [23877]

(11) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Staffordshire; [23881]

(12) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Norfolk; [23885]

(13) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Gloucestershire; [23889]

(14) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Dorset; [23895]

(15) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Central Scotland; [23852]

(16) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in the Highlands; [23854]

(17) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Fife; [23856]

(18) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Galloway; [23858]

(19) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Buckinghamshire; [23891]

(20) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Mid Glamorgan; [23863]

(21) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Clywd; [23867]

(22) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Tyne and Wear; [23871]

(23) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Lancashire; [23875]

(24) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Nottinghamshire; [23879]

(25) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Leicestershire; [23883]

(26) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Northamptonshire; [23887]

(27) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in West Sussex; [23898]

(28) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Somerset; [23894]

(29) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Hereford and Worcester; [23902]

(30) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in the Borders; [23859]

(31) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in South Glamorgan; [23861]

(32) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Dyfed; [23866]

(33) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Northumberland; [23870]

(34) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in North Yorkshire; [23874]

(35) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in South Yorkshire; [23878]

(36) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Shropshire; [23882]

(37) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Suffolk; [23886]

(38) how many dwellings are (a) owned by his Department and (b) currently unoccupied in each parliamentary constituency in Warwickshire; [23890]

Mr. Soames: The information is not held in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pembroke Dock (Staff)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many of the posts transferred to Pembroke Dock are currently filled by staff living in the (a) Devonport and (b) Clyde areas; [23597]

(2) how many posts will be (a) transferred to Pembroke Dock, (b) transferred to Pembroke Dock, (b) transferred from Pembroke Dock and (c) made redundant at Pembroke Dock following his announcement on the market testing of ports and mooring work within his Department; and if he will list the Departments in which they will be employed; [23599]

(3) how many individuals are currently based at Pembroke Dock onshore or aboard vessels; and what grades they are and on which divisions of his Department they were employed prior to the announcement of the outcome of market testing in his Department; [23596]

(4) how many mobile grades will be transferred to Pembroke Dock following his announcement on the market testing of the mooring and ports divisions of his Department. [23598]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 29 March 1996]: The current bearing for Pembroke Dock is 73 posts, broken down as follows:

Ports undertaking

	Number
MSO 2 D	1
MSO 2 E	1
MSO 3 D	1
MSO 3 E	1

Ports undertaking

	Number
Bosun in charge	1
Mechanician in charge	2
Leading seaman	1
Chief catering rating	1
Able seaman (cook)	2
Engineroom rating	4
Able seaman	6
Total	21

MSO = Marine services officer
SOG = Stores officer grade
P and GS = Process and general supervisory.

Stores assistant (Bd6)	2
Forklift truck driver	1
Rigger trainee	1
Craft auxiliary A	7
Slinger	2
Burner	1
General hand (Bd2)	5
Total	52

MSO = Marine services officer
SOG = Stores officer grade
P and GS = Process and general supervisory.

The 21 posts in the ports undertaking will transfer to Devonport. Of the 52 posts on moorings work, 17 will become surplus to requirements.

It is estimated that nine posts will be created at Pembroke Dock to undertake new tasks associated with the moorings operation. These posts will be eligible to be filled by mobile grade staff from Pembroke Dock, Clyde, Devonport, Portsmouth and Bath who have the requisite skills. An additional seven specialist posts may transfer to Pembroke Dock subject to further consideration.

At present there are 90 afloat posts, as detailed in the following table, for the large mooring vessels currently operating out of Devonport and Clyde. The future requirement is estimated as in the region of 48 posts. These vessels will be administered from Pembroke Dock, as will a number of smaller vessels stationed at Devonport and Portsmouth.

Departmental Staff (Ethnic Minorities)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's failure in 1994–95 to achieve its target for staff who are from ethnic minorities; and for what reasons this target has been reduced for 1995–96. [23264]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 28 March 1996]: The Department's 1994–95 target for civilian staff from ethnic minority backgrounds was set at 1.9 per cent. A percentage of 1.6 per cent. was achieved and our 1995–96 target is to maintain this level. The target of 1.9 per cent. was set against high levels of recruitment in the early 1990s. Given lower levels of recruitment, reductions in staff numbers and relocations from London, maintenance of existing levels of ethnic minority representation is a more realistic expectation.

Nuclear, Biological and Chemical Defences

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what improvements he has made to Britain's nuclear, biological and chemical defences in the last five years. [23258]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 28 March 1996]: We have made a range of improvements to our nuclear biological and chemical defence in recent years, mainly as a result of lessons learnt during the Gulf war. These include: the development of a tri-service policy for our NBCD requirements in the post-cold war environment; an extensive research and equipment programme; and revised training programmes. A Territorial Army NBCD regiment is being formed which will combine new equipment and training and dedicated manpower in a single deployable unit.

Women Executives

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the reasons for his Department's failure in 1994–95 to achieve its target of total staff who are women at higher executive officer level; for what reasons the target has been reduced; and if he will make a statement. [23262]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 28 March 1996]: The Department's 1994–95 target for women at HEO level and above was set at 13.6 per cent. A percentage of 13.3 per cent. was achieved, matching the achievement in 1993–94. In retrospect, the target for 1994–95 was too optimistic, given the extent of organisational change at the time. More realistic target setting, taking better account of major reorganisations and redeployments, overall reductions in staff numbers and promotion trends, caused the target to be set at 13.4 per cent for 1995–96.

HEALTH

Yorkshire Regional Health Authority

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will now take to recover irregular payments in the cases detailed by the inquiry into the former Yorkshire regional health authority. [22737]

Mr. Malone: The successor authority is taking appropriate recovery action in the light of legal advice.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will set out the advice which he has given to the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority about ensuring that the authority receives a fair share of any development gain in the sale of the former Yorkshire regional health authority headquarters at Harrogate; and if he will make a statement. [23608]

Mr. Malone: The sale of the headquarters of the former Yorkshire regional health authority was an integral part of the process of securing more appropriate and cost-effective accommodation for the NHS executive Northern and Yorkshire regional office. This will result in significant savings for reinvestment in patient care in the region.

The offer to purchase the former headquarters building was made at a fixed price, in excess of the district valuer's valuation of the property. While there is no prospect of increasing receipts beyond this point, any alternative arrangements would have incorporated a lower guaranteed minimum sale price, and hence a risk of realising less than the present arrangement. Expert advice, based on the office market in Harrogate and the property itself, has confirmed that the authority obtained best value for money at lower risk through the fixed price arrangement.

NHS Authorities (Payments)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on irregular, unauthorised and illegal payments to health service bodies. [22746]

Mr. Malone: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has received no reports of health service bodies receiving such payments.

NHS Consultants

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines are given to NHS trusts regarding the employment of management consultants for the training of their staff. [22540]

Mr. Horam: No guidelines relate specifically to the use of management consultants for training. However, in October 1994, the national health service executive issued guidance to the NHS on the use of consultants for all purposes; this includes those employed for all purposes; this includes those employed for training purposes. A copy of the guidance, "The Procurement and Management of Consultants within the NHS", is available in the Library.

Comptroller and Auditor General Report

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will break down the figure of £41.8 million in paragraph 40 of the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General in the "NHS (England) Summarised Accounts 1994–95" to show the amount of money paid in each financial year between April 1990 and March 1995 by each family health services association to fund the employment of staff of types covered by the High Court judgment of March 1995, mentioned in paragraph 39 of the Comptroller and Auditor General's report "NHS (England) Summarised Accounts 1994–95." [22990]

Mr. Malone: The information will be placed in the Library.

Anti-smoking Publications

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many Government-funded publications produced by (a) the Health Education Authority and (b) other bodies, that warn of the dangers of smoking or that encourage smokers to quit, have been translated into other languages; [23236]

(2) if he will list each anti-smoking publication publicly funded in the last five years with (a) its circulation, (b) its principal messages, (c) its target audience and (d) the languages it has been translated into and how many copies made per language. [23166]

Mr. Horam: The available information will be placed in the Library.

Organophosphate Information Network

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions his Department has had with the organophosphate information network; and if he will make a statement. [23176]

Mr. Horam: There have been no recent approaches to the Department from the network.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he was first advised of a possible new strain of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease; and if he was informed of any change in the assessment of health risks associated with bovine spongiform encephalopathy in cattle, arising out of this discovery. [23171]

Mr. Horam: My right hon. Friend was informed of a previously unrecognised form of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease on 8 March 1996. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee advised him on 20 March that, if the existing and newly recommended control measures were carried out, the risk to humans from eating beef was now likely to be extremely small.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many confirmed cases of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease have been notified for people aged (a) under 20 years, (b) 20 to 30 years, (c) 31 to 40 years, (d) 41 to 50 years, (e) 51 to 60 years and (f) 60 years and over; and how many were (i) male and (ii) female in each year for which records are available. [23218]

Mr. Horam: Information showing the number of definite and probable cases of CJD by the age groups requested and by sex for the period 1970 to 1984—England and Wales—and 1985 to March 1996—United Kingdom—will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) which organisations will receive funding for the proposed additional research into CJD; and if he will make a statement; [24021]

(2) if future CJD research funded out of the NHS research budget will include transmission studies; and if he will make a statement. [24022]

Mr. Horam: As announced by my right hon. Friend to the House on 25 March, Official Report, columns 710–12, we have in preparation a directed programme of research in the BSE-CJD sector involving the Department of Health, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Medical Research Council and the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Council. The programme will include strain typing and transmission studies. Further details, including the organisations involved, will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Frank Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will investigate the possibility of CJD carriers passing on the disease as blood donors; and if he will make a statement. [24092]

Mr. Horam: The safety of blood is kept under regular review by the expert Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Blood and Tissues for Transplantation. There is no evidence of any risk of transmission of CJD through blood or blood products. However, as a precautionary measure, individuals with central nervous system diseases or risk factors for CJD, including a family history, are excluded from giving blood.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money his Department spent on research into CJD in each of the last five financial years. [24023]

Mr. Horam: The information requested is as follows:

1991–92: £181,000
1992–93: £148,000
1993–94: £225,000
1994–95: £387,000
1995–96: £502,000.

This includes the costs of the national Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease surveillance unit in Edinburgh.

Total Government spending on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and CJD research is about £9 million this year, and, as my right hon. Friend announced on 20 March, Official Report, columns 375-86, the Department is making an additional £4.5 million available for further research.

NHS Patients

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were admitted in the past year to NHS (a) intensive care and (b) other beds from independent sector (i) acute hospitals or clinics and (ii) long-stay hospitals or homes. [23298]

Mr. Horam: The information which is available centrally is the estimated number of admissions to NHS hospitals in England from non-NHS hospitals, nursing homes, health care or residential institutions. In 1993–94, the latest year for which data are available, there were estimated to be 28,940 such admissions.

Organophosphate Poisoning

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps are being taken by his Department to educate doctors about organophosphate poisoning; and if he will make a statement. [23177]

Mr. Horam: Medical education is principally a matter for the medical profession. However, the Department is drawing the attention of the profession to the concerns over training of doctors in the recognition of organophosphate poisoning.

The Department has published a book, "Pesticide Poisoning Notes for the Guidance of Medical Practitioners", which was sent to all general practitioners. A revised and enlarged edition is about to be published. It gives guidance on the clinical symptoms, first aid treatment, indications for referral to hospital, hospital management, and sources of further advice relevant to poisoning by pesticides and related veterinary medicines including those containing organophosphates. In addition, the chief medical officer wrote in 1991 and 1993 to all doctors in England to alert them to the possibility of exposure to pesticides and certain veterinary medicines and to remind them of the reporting schemes for cases of suspected poisoning. They were further reminded that advice on poisoning was available from the employment medical advisory service and the Department of Health book "Pesticide poisoning notes for the guidance of medical practitioners". Also, an article in the October 1995 edition of the chief medical officer's update which is sent to all doctors dealt with the problems related to the use of organophosphate sheep dips.

Doctors (Educational Exchanges)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many doctors from outside the European Economic Area visited the United Kingdom in each of the last five years as part of educational exchanges with British GPs. [23394]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the difficulties experienced by British GPs arranging educational exchanges with GPs from outside the European Economic Area. [23395]

Mr. Malone: Representations have been received from the Royal College of General Practitioners, the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice, the General Medical Services Committee of the British Medical Association, "Doctor" magazine and a number of individual GPs.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent the proposal for a special licence for international exchanges that would permit a doctor from abroad to practice in the United Kingdom for a specific period, at a specific location, under the supervision of a named mentor, is compatible with a single standard of entry into general practice in the United Kingdom. [23396]

Mr. Malone: The standard of experience which a doctor requires for entry to general practice is set for the United Kingdom by the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice, which is the UK's competent authority in this area. Either a doctor meets this standard, and may practise in the UK, or he does not, and may not practise. We do not propose to introduce a special licence to allow doctors who do not meet the joint committee's standards to work in general practice.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he has taken to facilitate exchanges between British GPs and those from outside the European Economic Area. [23397]

Mr. Malone: Nothing in United Kingdom legislation prevents such exchanges taking place. We encourage exchanges between United Kingdom general practitioners and general practitioners from other countries. The incoming doctor must meet the standard for working in general practice in the United Kingdom which is set by the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice.

Water Tower Mental Hospitals

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the location, by health authority, of the water tower mental hospitals in England which are still open, (b) their planned date of closure and (c) the number of patients in each at the latest available date. [23546]

Mr. Bowis: Information is available on the closure of large mental illness hospitals in the report "Survey of English Mental Hospitals March 1994—Monitoring the Closure of the Water Towers", copies of which are available in the Library. The available information on the number of patients cared for in each of the hospitals named in table 2 of the report is given in the table. The continuing monitoring of the closure programme has been taken forward by the regional offices of the national health service executive.

Universities (Health Services Management)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what (a) courses have been attended at the health services management unit of the university of Nottingham and (b) other resources of the unit have been used by (i) NHS management trainees and (ii) existing NHS staff; [23675]

(2) what (a) courses have been attended at the health services management unit of the university of Manchester and (b) other resources of the unit have been used by (i) NHS management trainees and (ii) existing NHS staff; [23679]

(3) which (a) courses have been attended at the health policy unit of the university of London and (b) other resources of the unit have been used by (i) NHS management trainees and (ii) existing NHS staff; [23671]

(4) what (a) courses have been attended at the health services management centre of the university of Birmingham and (b) other resources of the centre have been used by (i) NHS management trainees and (ii) existing NHS staff; [23677]

(5) what (a) courses have been attended at the health policy and practice unit of the university of East Anglia and (b) other resources of the unit have been used by (i) NHS management trainees and(ii) existing NHS staff. [23673]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Mr Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many contracts have been awarded to the health services management unit of the university of Nottingham since 1994 by (a) his Department, (b) the NHS executive, (c) the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority, (d) the former Yorkshire RHA and (e) the Trent RHA; for what purposes these contracts were awarded; if they were awarded by competitive tender; and what was the value of each of these contracts. [23676]

(2) how many contracts have been awarded to the health services management unit of the university of Manchester since 1994 by (a) his Department, (b) the NHS executive, (c) the Northern and Yorkshire regional helath authority, (d) the former Yorkshire RHA, and (e) the Trent RHA; for what purposes these contracts were awarded; if they were awarded by competitive tender; and what was the value of each of these contracts; [23680]

(3) how many contracts have been awarded to the health policy unit of the university of London since 1994 by (a) his department, (b) the NHS executive, (c) the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority, (d) the former Yorkshire regional health authority and (e) the Trent regional health authority; for what purposes these contracts were awarded; if they were awarded by competitive tender; and what was the value of each of these contracts; [23672]

(4) how many contracts have been awarded to the health services management centre of the university of Birmingham since 1994 by (a) his Department, (b) the NHS executive, (c) the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority, (d) the former Yorkshire RHA and (e) the Trent RHA; for what purposes these contracts were awarded; if they were awarded by competitive tender; and what was the value of each of these contracts; [23678]

[23674]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available centrally.

GP Purchasing

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has given to health authorities in respect of the funding of a GP commission. [23421]

Mr. Malone: EL(94)79 sets out Government policy on involving general practitioners in purchasing. HSG(96)14 sets out details of management allowances for fundholding practices. Other arrangements are for local agreement. Copies of the guidance are available in the Library.

Public Health Management (Salaries)

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of state for Health what was the salary of the (a) chief medical officer, (b) deputy chief medical officer and (c) regional directors of public health in each of the last two years; and if he will indicate the planned salaries for the next two years. [23423]

Mr. Horam: Details of individual civil servants' salaries are not made public. The chief medical officer is a grade 1A civil servant. In 1994–95 the salary of that grade was £87,435, in 1995–96 it is in the range of £90,000 to £94,999. There are two deputy chief medical officer posts in the Department. The pay range for those posts was £69,990 to £79,396 in 1994–95, and £67,500 to £98,000 in 1995–96. Regional directors of public health were paid on a scale from £59,715 to £63,375 in 1994–95, and £61,205 to £65,160 in 1995–96. Like all national health service consultants, regional directors of public health are eligible for distinction awards for meritorious service in the NHS, which were worth between £2,098 and £49,820 per annum in 1995–96, depending on the level of award. Regional directors of public health joined the Department of Health on 1 April. All salary increases in the Department are now determined by performance, so future salaries for all the grades mentioned will depend on the achievement of objectives.

Hospital Readmissions

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the quarterly monitoring of mental health information by the NHS executive in the coming year will include readmission rates for individual patients. [23550]

Mr. Bowis: No. The national health service executive will be collecting information on the total number of patients aged 16 to 64, who are readmitted as an emergency within 90 days of discharge to the care of a psychiatric specialist; and the total number of patients aged 16 to 64 who have been discharged in the previous 90 days from the care of a psychiatric specialist.

NHS Management (Salaries)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rother Valley of 25 March, Official Report, column 427, if he will list all cases in which remuneration has not been paid directly to chairmen of national health service bodies. [23720]

Mr. Malone: It is for individual national health service bodies to ensure that remuneration of chairmen and non-executives is paid direct, and in accordance with Inland Revenue requirements. We are not aware of any cases where this does not happen.

Paracetamol

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he will take to prevent deaths of young people arising from the use of paracetamol. [23422]

Mr. Malone: No immediate measures additional to those already in place are proposed. Paracetamol is an effective pain killer which is safe at the dosage recommended on the labelling. The Medicines Control Agency carefully evaluates all new information on the safety of paracetamol, particularly in relation to the controls on its availability.

Cancer (Vaccinations)

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list vaccinations currently available on the NHS assessed by his Department as helping to prevent cancer. [23424]

Mr. Horam: In protecting people from acquiring hepatitis B infection, hepatitis B vaccine will also serve to prevent that proportion of cases of hepatocellular carcinoma—primary liver cancer—that is associated with the long-term carriage of hepatitis B virus.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer on 12 March, Official Report, column 587, if the 68 health authorities whose plans anticipate the development of comprehensive mental health services before the end of 1996–97 included in those plans the provision of 24-hour nurse care for those residents needing it, within that time scale; and if he will list those authorities which all achieved adequate 24-hour nursed care provision for their residents before the end of 1996–97 and those that will not. [23545]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not yet available. Progress on the plans will be assessed at the end of 1996–97.

Care in the Community

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice he has received from the chief medical officer on the full implementation of the care programme approach for patients with a primary diagnosis of schizophrenia discharged from hospital since 1992–93 or expected to be discharged. [24010]

Mr. Bowis: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly receives advice from the chief medical officer or from other medical advisors on his behalf. Information on the implementation of the care programme approach does not, however, differentiate between patients with schizophrenia and other severely mentally ill patients.

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for the calendar year 1995, for each member of the Committee on Safety of Medicines, the number of meetings at which they were present and the number of meetings from which they were absent. [22085]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 28 March, Official Report, column 748.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 December 1995, Official Report, columns 520–21, what steps he took to establish that no member of the Committee on Safety of Medicines received the papers dispatched on 11 October after 10.30 am on 12 October 1995. [22086]

Mr. Malone: Delivery times are guaranteed by the courier service used. No member complained that the papers were not received on time.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answers of 11 December 1995, Official Report, column 521, and 14 December 1995, Official Report, column 811, on what basis expenditure on travel and subsistence during the period 1990 to 1995 was made; and if the expenditure was approved by the National Audit Office. [22088]

Mr. Malone: The expenditure on travel and subsistence was incurred in the performance of the normal duties of the committees.

The expenditure referred to in the reply I gave the hon. Member on 11 December 1995, columns 521–22, has been included in the accounts of the Medicines Control Agency, which since 1 April 1992 have been subject to audit by the National Audit Office.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 December 1995, Official Report, column 523, what limitations section 4(2) of the Medicines Act 1968 imposes on the scope of activity and advice of committees, set up under section 4 of the Act. [22089]

Mr. Malone: Section 4(2) of the Medicines Act 1968 provides that committees may be established under section 4(1) of that Act for any purpose, or combination of purposes, connected with the execution of that Act or the exercise of any power conferred by it, either generally or in relation to any particular class of substances or articles to which any provision of that Act is applicable. The implication is that such committees cannot be established for other purposes and that their activities and advice may not relate to other purposes.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 14 December 1995, Official Report, column 811, to the hon. Member for Gordon Mr. Bruce), what factors justify the appointment of members of the Committees on Safety of Medicines or other section 4 committees for a period in excess of the prescribed maximum of six years. [22090]

Mr. Malone: Members are normally appointed for a three-year period and may be reappointed for further terms of office. Members are appointed and reappointed for their individual expertise in the fields of medicine, pharmacy or science. Their specialist knowledge and judgment contribute to the advice given by the committee to the Licensing Authority.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 14 December 1995, Official Report, column 810, to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), what quality assurance proceedings relating to pharmacovigilance are in place in the Medicines Control Agency. [22091]

Mr. Malone: The Medicines Control Agency's performance in pharmacovigilance is measured against a number of high-level targets, set to protect pubic health in the field of medical products. These are published in the agency's business plan and its accomplishments against them in its annual report, copies of which are available in the Library. The agency has in place a large number of rigorous standard operating procedures relating to its many pharmacovigilance functions in order to ensure that good pharmacovigilance practice is carried out. Assessment reports on important safety issues relating to licensed medicines are subject to peer review both with the agency and by independent experts on the relevant advisory committees.

All agency procedures are subject to audit by the National Audit Office and internal Department of Health auditors.

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answers of 11 December 1995, Official Report, columns 520–21, and 8 February 1995, Official Report, column 344, what factors prevented consideration of the safety issues relating to combined oral contraceptives containing desogestrel or gestodene by the pharmacovigilance subcommittee at its meetings on 5 September or 3 October. [22087]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1151.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies have been undertaken to establish whether potentially BSE contaminated material can enter human blood systems via tooth cavities when children are losing their milk teeth. [23219]

Mr. Horam: None. The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee has considered this issue and accepts that this could be a route of BSE infection, if this occurs, as could dental disease in adults.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 January, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23633]

Mr. Horam: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23619]

Mr. Horam: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave him today.

National Blood Authority

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff were employed at the National Blood Authority headquarters at 1 March 1996; and what was the total budgetary allowance for operating the National Blood Authority headquarters for 1996–97. [23433]

Mr. Horam: Some 24 staff were employed at the National Blood Authority headquarters at 1 March 1996. The National Blood Authority's estimates for 1996–97 include some £1.8 million for the costs of its headquarters. This includes costs such as rental, administrative and equipment costs, as well as staff salaries.

Incontinence

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans he has to promote continence care and services, and if he will make a statement; [23456]

(2) what guidance he has issued to health authorities on the provision of incontinence services; [23458]

(3) if he will draw up and publish national criteria for the provision of incontinence services through a Department of Health guideline; [23459]

(4) what measures he has taken to monitor incontinence services provided by health authorities. [23462]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Sir J. Hannam) on 27 February, Official Report, columns 463–64.

We have issued the following guidance to the NHS:

An Agenda for Action on Continence Services (Department of Health) issued in 1991;

The Role of the Continence Adviser in England and Wales (Social Policy Research Unit, University of York) issued in 1994;

Incontinence (Patient Perception Leaflet—NHS Executive) issued in 1994;

Incontinence—Causes, Management and Provision of Services (Royal College of Physicians) issued on 28 March 1996;

Commissioning Comprehensive Continence Services—Guidance for Purchasers (The Continence Foundation) issued on 28 March 1996.

Copies of these publications will be placed in the Library.

Work is continuing on a nursing-led clinical guideline on the management of incontinence.

The organisation of continence services locally and the manner in which they are delivered are matters for district health authorities and hospital and community trusts.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the long-term saving in residential care costs from providing support services in their own homes to patients who suffer from incontinence. [23457]

Mr. Bowis: We have made no such estimate.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what was the amount spent on incontinence products by each health authority in each of the last five years; [24083]

(2) what was the amount spent on incontinence products for residents of private nursing homes who have been placed there by the health authority, by authority, in each of the last five years. [24084]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people are currently affected by incontinence in the United Kingdom. [24085]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Food Costs

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the amount spent per patient on food by NHS hospitals and trusts in each year since 1979. [24028]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Renal Dialysis

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will publish estimates which have been provided to him of the numbers of people per million of population who need renal dialysis treatment for each regional health authority area for each year since 1986; [24088]

(2) if he will publish the estimates which have been provided to him of the numbers of people per million of population who have received renal dialysis treatment for each regional health authority area for each year since 1986; [24089]

(3) when he intends to publish the renal service review report. [24087]

Mr. Horam: We are still considering the best way to take forward the report of the renal review, and intend to issue guidance on purchasing renal services to health authorities in due course. This would include information on the numbers of people who received renal dialysis in each region. Information on the numbers of people who need renal dialysis is not available centrally; however, guidance has been issued to health authorities on how to carry out a needs assessment of their populations for renal disease.

Cancer Research

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into links between the operations of Menwith Hill station in North Yorkshire and local incidence of cancer. [23776]

Mr. Horam: The Department has neither commissioned nor evaluated any research specifically into the local incidence of cancer near Menwith Hill station. However, I understand that the North Yorkshire health authority is aware of speculative suggestions of a raised incidence of cancer in the area, is currently examining relevant health statistics that are routinely maintained for the area, and is in contact with local community representatives.

Tobacco

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ban the import of tobacco on Health grounds. [23990]

Mr. Horam: No. While determined to reduce the prevalence of tobacco use, we believe that the provision of all relevant information on the dangers of smoking allows people to make their own decision.

Children in Care

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in the care of the local authority have taken up a training place from age 16 years in each of the last five years. [24027]

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Rendering Industry

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial support will be provided to the rendering industry and knackers yards in the financial year 1996–97. [24467]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Rendering plants and associated trades are vital service industries, without which UK animal production cannot take place. In the absence of these industries, it is likely that animal waste would be unlawfully buried or dumped, leading to unacceptable health and environmental risks.

In view both of the ban on the use of mammalian meat-and-bone meal in feed for all farm animals and of current market conditions, it is proposed to provide temporary financial assistance to rendering plants of up to £118 million in the financial year 1996–97. My officials are preparing detailed proposals on the operation of this support.

Parliamentary approval to this new service will be sought in a supplementary estimate for class III, vote 2 (Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food: operational expenditure, agencies and departmental administration). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £40 million will be met by repayable advances from the contingencies fund.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Channel Islands

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what rights United Kingdom citizens have to live and work in Jersey; [22711]

(2) if citizens of the Channel Islands have the right to live and work anywhere within the European Union. [22710]

Mr. Sackville: Channel Islanders benefit from European Union provisions relating to the free movement of persons or services only if they have close ties with the United Kingdom—for example, if they, a parent or grandparent were born, adopted, naturalised or registered in the United Kingdom—or they have been ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom for a period of five years. The traditional right of abode in the United Kingdom for Channel islanders is, however, unaffected by these provisions.

There are no restrictions on British citizens travelling to Jersey, which, together with Guernsey, the Isle of Man, the Republic of Ireland and the United Kingdom forms part of the common travel area.

However, in view of the serious shortage of dwelling space on the island, there are restrictions under Jersey law on the acquisition of dwelling accommodation, whether by purchase or by lease.

KGB Agent

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to identify the KGB agent codenamed Iogann. [23049]

Mr. Howard: It is long-standing Government policy not to comment on operational matters relating to security and intelligence.

Artyom M. Tarasov

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will investigate the antecedents of Artyom M. Tarasov, born in Moscow on 4 July 1950. [23050]

Mr. Howard: No.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by his Department and its executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if he will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by his Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22875]

Mr. Howard: The information requested is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines are currently in force in his Department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within his Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases. [22859]

Mr. Howard: Detailed Home Office guidance on competitive tendering procedures has been very widely circulated in the Home Office and its agencies. This incorporates the Government's public purchasing policy consolidated guidelines requiring goods and services to be obtained by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary. In addition, the European Community procurement directives and World Trade Organisation Government procurement agreement require most contracts above specified thresholds to be awarded following competition, subject to certain specified exceptions. The central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 40 has also been circulated within the Home Office and provides an overview of best practice in competitive tendering.

Except for very low-value items, all proposals to buy goods and services by single tender are required to be refer to a specialist procurement unit within the Home. Office. Single tender will be approved only in exceptional circumstances; for example, when for reasons of security, or compatibility with existing equipment or the protection of intellectual property rights, goods or services may be provided by only one supplier.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in how many cases of detained asylum seekers since 4 July 1995 there was a dispute as to the individual's true age; and in how many of these cases a special adjudicator's assessment of the age of the person concerned supported (a) the immigration service opinion or (b) the age claimed by the individual concerned. [23511]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost by examining individual local case files.

EDS Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what outsourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should we seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23737]

Mr. Howard: My agencies do not have any outsourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of outsourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in house; and if he will make a statement. [24229]

Mr. Howard: My Department does not have any outsourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Police Information Technology

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on future arrangements for the delivery of police information technology. [24468]

Mr. Howard: With the agreement of the police service and police authorities the Government have decided to establish a new body—the Police Information Technology Organisation—to deliver information technology more efficiently and effectively to the police service in England, Wales and Scotland. PITO will initially be set up on a non-statutory basis, as part of the Home Office, with effect from 1 April. The new organisation will take over many of the functions and staff of the former police department science and technology group.

PITO will be responsible for promoting the delivery of national police information technology services, such as the police national computer and the police national network, and taking forward the national strategy for police information systems by co-ordinating the development of local information technology systems where common standards and systems are needed.

PITO will operate on a partnership basis between the Home and Scottish Offices, chief offices and police authorities. To reflect this tripartite approach, a council will be appointed to advise me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on the discharge of PITO's functions.

It is proposed to place PITO on a statutory footing as soon as the Government's legislative programme allows. Following legislation, the advisory council will be replaced by an executive board responsible for the strategic management of the organisation.

Director General of the Prison Service

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the appointment of the Director General of the Prison Service; and if he will make a statement. [24469]

Mr. Howard: With the approval of the Prime Minister, I have today appointed Richard Tilt as Director General of the Prison Service.

I also propose to establish a Prison Service Advisory Board to advise me on the performance and plans of the Prison Service, including the key performance indicators, and on policy matters relating to the Prison Service. The advisory board will have a part-time non-executive chairman and the other members will include the director general, other senior Home Office and Prison Service officials and other non-executives.

I have concluded that the terms of the framework document which established the Prison Service as an executive agency of the Home Office in 1993 would benefit from some clarification. I propose to ask the advisory board further to consider the need for such clarification and to make recommendations.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a list of all overseas visits made by all Ministers of his Department since 1990, including (a) details of the places visited and brief reasons for the visit, (b) details of the size, composition and cost to public funds of the delegation and (c) the names of non-ministerial members of each delegation and the capacity in which each was present. [17482]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 1 March 1996]: I have placed a note in the Library setting out the readily available information on ministerial visits sought by the hon. Member. The list of visits includes the details requested for the period since 1 January 1995. The details requested for the period prior to that date are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what co-operative arrangements are in place between the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland to prevent the importing of bovine spongiform encephalopathy into the United Kingdom; and what measures are taken to prevent its importation from the Republic of Ireland. [22937]

Mr. Ancram: Officials from the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland regularly meet counterparts from the Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the Republic of Ireland to discuss all aspects of animal health and there is local co-operation with official veterinarians on both sides of the border. EU legislation requires all bovine animals imported from another member state, including the Republic of Ireland, to be accompanied by documentation and their importation to be notified in advance. Department of Agriculture veterinarians carry out random checks on such animals at their point of destination, including checks for any visible signs of BSE. Veterinary staff also inspect all animals presented for slaughter at meat plants to ensure that they show no signs of BSE. Any that show such signs are slaughtered separately and their carcases incinerated.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many cattle in Northern Ireland have contracted bovine spongiform encephalopathy in each of the past five years; and how many have died. [22940]

Mr. Ancram: All animals affected or suspected of being affected with BSE are slaughtered and their carcases incinerated. The number of cattle in Northern Ireland that have contracted—that is, been confirmed as having—BSE in each of the last five years is:

March 1991—February 1992: 179

March 1992—February 1993: 398

March 1993—February 1994: 477

March 1994—February 1995: 309

March 1995—February 1996: 153.

In some cases, affected animals die before slaughter. The number of cattle that have contracted bovine spongiform encephalopathy over the last five years and have died is:

March 1991—February 1992: 7

March 1992—February 1993: 15

March 1993—February 1994: 8

March 1994—February 1995: 2

March 1995—February 1996: 3.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by his Department and its executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if he will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by his Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22870]

Sir John Wheeler: Within the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments the information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what guidelines are currently in force in his Department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within his Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases. [22855]

Sir John Wheeler: In relation to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders the Northern Ireland Departments, the Northern Ireland Office and their executive agencies operate under the principles of Government accounting as set out in "Government Accounting" and "Government Accounting Northern Ireland"; the provisions of the following procurement legislation:

The Public Supply Contracts Regulations 1995—SI 1995 No. 201

The Public Services Contracts Regulations 1993—SI 1993 No. 3228

The Public Works Contracts Regulations 1991—SI 1991 No. 2680;

and the series of supplementary guidance notes on purchasing and supply procedures issued by the central unit on procurement HM Treasury.

These publications set out the grounds on which single negotiated tenders may be used and the procedures to justify their use.

Pensioners and Disabled People

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (i) men, (ii) women and (iii) young people of each sex are (a) pensioners and (b) registered disabled in each council area in Northern Ireland; and if he will express these figures as a percentage of the total population. [21982]

Sir John Wheeler: The 1991 census of population provides the most recent information on the number of people of pensionable age in each district council area in Northern Ireland broken down by sex. This information is as follows.

District council	Total population	Total males	Total females	Total persons aged 60–65+ years	Total males aged 65+ years	Total females aged 60+ years	Persons aged 60–65+ as percentage of total population	Males aged 65+ as percentage of total males	Female aged 60+ as percentage of total females

Fish Farming

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 29 January, Official Report, column 525, what assessment he has made of how many of the ponds comply with (a) the fishery protection measures of the Fisheries Act (Northern Ireland) 1966 and (b) the provisions governing the installation of grids, grills and lattices. [21807]

Mr. Ancram: All the ponds have been assessed for compliance with the fishery protection measures of the Fisheries Act (Northern Ireland) 1966. Compliance with the requirement for the installation of grids, grills and lattices is monitored by staff of the Fisheries Conservancy Board for Northern Ireland during routine river patrols, but as this requirement applies only in situations where water is abstracted and returned to a river very few of the ponds would be subject to it. The Fisheries Conservancy Board does not require access to pond sites to undertake this monitoring nor does it have statutory responsibility for fish culture requiring such access.

Cultural Bodies

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the (a) Irish and (b) Ulster Scots cultural bodies which received funding from the central community relations unit in 1995–96; how much funding was awarded to each body; and what assessment he has made of the equity of distribution between (a) and (b). [22412]

Mr. Ancram: Further to my answer of 14 March 1996, Official Report, columns 743–44, the following Irish language and Ulster Scots cultural bodies have received funding from the budget of the central community relations unit in the current financial year.

(a) Irish language cultural bodies:

CCRU has directly funded the following bodies:

Ultach Trust	93,757
Gael Linn	43,000
Comhaltas Uladh	27,125
Preas an Phobail	25,258
Oideas Gael Uladh	5,000

The cultural traditions group has funded the following groups, drawing on grant provided by CCRU:

Comhchoiste na Gaeilge Aontroim Thuaidh	21,000
Condradh na Gaeilge	1,200

Small grants of less than £1,000 were made by the cultural traditions group to:

An Cumann Gaelach; Cairdeas na Teanga; Coiste na Bealtaine; Comhaltas an Chreagain; Culturlann Mac Adam—O Fiaich; and Radio an Iuir.

b. Ulster Scots Cultural Groups

The cultural traditions group made the following grants to Ulster Scots cultural groups, drawing on grant provided by CCRU:

Ulster Scots Heritage Council	12,470
Ulster Scots Academic Press	1,500

The distribution of these resources reflects the numbers of Irish language and Ulster Scots cultural groups in Northern Ireland, and the relative stage of development of the Irish language and Ulster Scots cultural movements. All applications for grant assistance are assessed on their merits.

Beef Industry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to promote the beef industry in Northern Ireland; what measures he will take to inform the public of the health safety of beef consumption; and if he will make a statement. [22939]

Mr. Ancram: The recent statement made by my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Health and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food cover comprehensively the health safety of beef consumption. We continue to work to ensure that the situation of the industry in Northern Ireland and its needs are registered on all occasions.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people in Northern Ireland have contracted Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease in each of the past five years; and how many have died. [22938]

Mr. Moss: There have been three cases, all fatal, resulting in one death in each of the years 1992, 1993 and 1995.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total cost of answering parliamentary questions in each Session since 1989–90. [22904]

Sir John Wheeler: The NIO and Northern Ireland Departments do not calculate the data requested, and they could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Schoolteachers

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Irish schoolteacher qualifications were recognised under EU rules in 1993–94 in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) Great Britain; how many United Kingdom schoolteacher qualifications were recognised in the Republic of Ireland; and what assessment he has made of the desirability of making a submission to the European Commission requesting enforcement proceedings in the European Court of Justice against the Republic's Irish language requirements for such recognition. [23233]

Mr. Ancram: Two such qualifications are recognised in Northern Ireland and in Great Britain. The number of United Kingdom qualifications recognised in the Republic of Ireland is a matter for the Irish Government. The European Court of Justice has already considered the compatibility of the requirement of linguistic knowledge with EU law.

Wheelchairs

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to ensure that indoor/outdoor powered wheelchairs are made freely available in Northern Ireland on the same lines as the Department of Health has announced for England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [23234]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 29 March 1996]: The Department of Health announcement referred only to England. In Northern Ireland the Department of Health and Social Services is currently exploring with the four health and social services boards how the wheelchair service might be improved. In this context they will be considering the provision of indoor/outdoor powered wheelchairs for severely disabled people and the implications for Northern Ireland of the proposals for a voucher scheme.

NHS (Residual Liabilities) Bill

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he made of the possibility of extending the NHS (Residual Liabilities) Bill to Northern Ireland; and what were the reasons for choosing the negative resolution procedure. [23230]

Mr. Moss [holding answer 29 March 1996]: This is a transferred matter and it is accepted practice to amend the existing Northern Ireland legislation by means of an Order in Council rather than extension of a Bill. The negative resolution procedure was chosen to maintain the integrity of the NI statute book and because there is some urgency to ensure consistency throughout the United Kingdom.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Internet

16. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information from her Department is made available over the Internet. [21907]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage uses its Internet site to provide information on the work of the Department; guidance on issues such as the care, preservation and management of records; press notices through the Central Office of Information; and links to those sponsored bodies which have an Internet presence.

National Lottery

17. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what research has been conducted by her Department on the effect on the finances of households of investing in the national lottery. [21908]

Mr. Sproat: My Department has commissioned surveys of spending on the national lottery and is also analysing other relevant surveys, such as the Central Statistical Office's family expenditure survey 1994–95. These surveys provide a breakdown of the total spending on the national lottery, which from the sales figures can be seen to be equivalent to around £2 a household a week, net of prizes.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement about the development of policy on the distribution of lottery proceeds. [24290]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have today issued to the chairman of the lottery distributing bodies changes to policy directions I intend to make under section 26 (1) and (2) of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993.

These changes will allow the arts councils to consider applications for revenue funding to help to develop talents, skills and creative abilities, particularly of young people; and to consider applications for lottery grants to fund access to and participation in the arts. They will allow the sports councils likewise to consider applications for revenue funding to help to develop sporting talent and skills, particularly of young people; and to consider applications for the funding of one-off major international sporting events. Finally, they will allow the national heritage memorial fund to consider applications for grants from building preservation trusts.

None of these directions is intended to promote awards which might substitute for existing funding through grant in aid. The Millennium Commission and the National Lottery Charities Board are already able to make revenue awards and are not affected by these proposals. My colleagues in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland will be writing today in similar terms to the distributing bodies for which they are responsible.

Millennium Exhibition

18. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultation she has had with east London boroughs subsequent to the announcement of the proposed site of the millennium exhibition. [21909]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Millennium Commission makes all decisions entirely independently of Government, and it is for the commission to determine the arrangements for a millennium exhibition. The commission has selected the ideas and concepts for an exhibition submitted by Imagination Group Ltd., and announced on 28 February its preference for the event to be located on the Greenwich peninsula site. It is for the commission to consult as it feels is necessary in order to determine whether to award a grant to a project.

The commission has stated that it will need to be fully satisfied as to the firm commitment of the private sector support and viability of the whole project before a final grant decision will be taken. Work is currently in progress to develop the proposals submitted, and this work may include consultation by the commission with the bodies that it feels are appropriate before taking its decision. Although much of the current work is focusing on the development of the business plan and commitment of finance, substantial other work is also under way, including a detailed traffic impact assessment, and consultation with boroughs adjacent to Greenwich that may be affected by the exhibition will most likely be needed at the appropriate point of work in progress.

British Tourist Authority

19. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the timetable for the appointment of a new chairman of the British Tourist Authority and English tourist board. [21910]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The new chairman will take up appointment after Ms Biss's term of office ends on 31 May.

Tourism

20. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what analysis she has made of the latest figures on spending by tourists. [21911]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Overseas visitors to the UK spent £11.7 billion in 1995. That is an increase of 18 per cent. on 1994, and a record in real terms. The latest figure for spending by all tourists in the UK is £34 billion in 1994, equivalent to over 5 per cent. of gross domestic product.

Arts, Sport and Heritage Funding

21. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on overall funding provision for (a) sport, (b) the arts and (c) heritage. [21913]

Mr. Sproat: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold).

Digital Terrestrial Television

22. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps she is taking to ensure that there is universal access to digital terrestrial television services. [21914]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Broadcasting Bill creates the conditions for maximising viewers' access to digital terrestrial television. Multiplex licences will be awarded to those applicants whose proposals are best calculated to promote the development of digital terrestrial broadcasting. Two of the most important criteria will be applicants' plans for maximising coverage and for encouraging the take-up of digital receivers.

British Film Industry

23. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about the future of the British film industry. [21915]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I receive regular representations from members of the film industry on a wide range of film-related issues.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the British film industry. [21918]

Mrs. Bottomley: The British film industry is currently in a buoyant state and the Government are committed to boosting it further. I congratulate Emma Thompson, Nick Park, James Acheson and John Blair on their recent success in winning academy awards, and also all those who were nominated. Over the past 20 years, British talent has won around 30 per cent. of all Oscars. A number of initiatives have recently been announced which will take forward the proposals set out in the policy paper published last year. Principal among these is confirmation that the national lottery will make more than £100 million available to film-related projects over the next five years—some £19.5 million has already been allocated. We have also set up an Advisory Committee on Film Finance, which is looking at obstacles to investment in the film industry and I look forward to receiving its report in July. I have also recently announced further allocations of money to Cinema 100, which is co-ordinating the celebrations of the centenary of the cinema, to the British Film Institute and to the European Film Studio. My Department has now started a feasibility study into the viability of a west end showcase for British films and I await the outcome of that study with great interest.

As well as these new initiatives, the Government are also, of course, committed to the continued funding of the British Film Institute, the National Film and Television School, British Screen Finance, the European Co-production Fund and the British Film Commission.

Satellite Television

24. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many representations she has received during the past six months on the exclusive televising of sporting events by satellite television; and if she will make a statement. [21916]

Mr. Sproat: My Department has received representations from a wide range of interests, including over 250 letters from hon. Members in the last six months. My Department also held formal discussions with organisations representing consumers, broadcasters, sports bodies and regulatory authorities. Many representations were promoted by the publication of our discussion paper "Informing the Debate".

25. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has to increase the percentage of British made programmes on satellite television; and if she will make a statement. [21917]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Since 1991, there has been a steady improvement in the proportion of British-made programming on satellite channels uplinked from the United Kingdom. I am pressing channels which do not yet meet the majority proportion of European programme content required to be achieved over time by the EU broadcasting directive to agree further targets for increasing such content where practicable.

Public Library Service

27. Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the future of the public library service. [21919]

Mr. Sproat: As indicated in my right hon. Friend's written statement to the House on 18 December 1995, columns 852-54, I will report further on the public library service in a policy paper addressing the issues raised by the public library review. I intend to publish this paper in the near future.

Safety at Sports Grounds

28. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps she is taking to review the operation of the safety at sports grounds legislation. [21920]

Mr. Sproat: The safety at sports grounds legislation is kept under regular review.

Locally Funded Theatres

29. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the future of locally funded theatres. [21921]

Mr. Sproat: Government funding in support of local theatres is channelled through the Arts Council and the regional arts boards. The funding of individual theatres is a matter for these bodies in conjunction with the local authorities and other funding partners.

Deregulation

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is her policy on deregulation; and if she will make a statement. [21895]

Mr. Sproat: I am taking forward the Government's campaign against red tape in the sectors for which I am responsible. In particular, my Department aims to remove obstacles to the competitiveness of the tourism industry, which is worth over £36 billion annually to the national economy. Many deregulatory measures beneficial to tourism have already been taken. We will work with other Departments to secure further deregulatory gains for the industry.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which (a) NHS hospital trusts and organisations and (b) private hospitals and medical organisations his Department has entered into contracts with for the purpose of testing of applicants for benefits administered by his Department in the current financial year and each of the three previous years; and if he will list the organisations involved, the nature of the contracts, the number of individuals covered by each contract, which agencies entered into these contracts and the monetary value of the contracts in each case. [22845]

Mr. Burt: This Department has not entered into contracts for this purpose with any NHS hospital trusts or organisations. Information about contracts with private hospitals and medical organisations is in the table.

Year	Agency	Organisation	Nature	Number of individuals	Value of contract
1992–93	—	None	—	—	—
1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96	War Pensions Agency	General Healthcare Group PLC	Provision of audiology services. Contract expires 31 October 1996	Varies according to the number of War Pension claims and appeals involving hearing loss	Varies according to the number and War Pension type of tests required

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what guidelines are currently in force in his Department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within his Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases. [22851]

Mr. Burt: Officials in this Department follow the guidance and instructions in the departmental purchasing and supply manual and the relevant domestic and EC legislation.

The Government's public purchasing policy consolidated guidelines require goods and services to be acquired by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary. In addition, the EC procurement directives and World Trade Organisation Government procurement agreement require most contracts above specified thresholds to be awarded following competition, subject to certain specified exceptions. The central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 40 provides an overview of best practice in the competitive tendering process.

Casual Workers (National Insurance)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will clarify the guidance given to those operating the national insurance contributions system, within his Department, with regard to the position of the self-employed status of casual workers in the film and television industry, with particular reference to the equivalent guidance given for taxation purposes. [20053]

Mr. Heald: Since 1987 the Department of Social Security and the Inland Revenue have adopted a common approach with the aim of minimising employment status differences. Where one Department has made a full examination of an individual case and issued a ruling, the other Department will normally adhere to it provided the circumstances remain the same.

General guidance on employment status is provided in a joint leaflet which applies for tax and national insurance purposes. In addition, within the film and TV industry, the Inland Revenue publishes grading lists to help employers determine which workers should be self-employed and which not. The Contributions Agency has also used these lists since 1992. These lists are reviewed annually.

Currently, the Contributions Agency is co-operating with the Inland Revenue to provide guidance for 1996–97. The intention is to simplify the lists both Departments use by providing a combined list including all parts of the industry which cover television, film, video and radio work.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 March, Official Report, column 646, when he intends to establish the threshold levels for grants to local authorities in respect of costs that they face from measures to remove benefit from serious asylum seekers; and what consultations he has had with local authorities in seeking to establish the level. [22461]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 28 March, Official Report, column 717.

Housing and Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to redesign or modify the procedure or forms which new income support claimants are given by the Benefits Agency to claims housing and council tax benefit. [22598]

Mr. Roger Evans: The content and design of the housing benefit and council tax benefit claim forms provided by the Benefits Agency are reviewed annually by the Department in consultation with the local authority associations and the Benefits Agency. A review is under way to identify the changes required in preparation for the implementation of jobseeker's allowance in October. Housing benefit and council tax benefit claims procedures are monitored continually.

Pensions

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost to public funds of commencing payment of a retirement pension on the day of a pensioner's 65th birthday. [18300]

Mr. Heald: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 19 March, Official Report, column 181.

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the number of pensioners who do not take up their entitlement to income support who also do not take up their entitlement to (a) housing benefit and (b) council tax benefit. [23967]

Mr. Heald: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 11 January, Official Report, column 325.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will assess the advantage of extending to married couples in divorce proceedings the same rules for division of pension rights as apply in the case of civil servants wishing to allocate part of their pension to their wives; and if he will list the rules applying to civil servants. [22957]

Mr. Heald: The provisions governing the allocation of civil service pensions are contained in section 5 of, and appendix 8 to, the rules of the principal civil service pension scheme.

The Government have announced their commitment to the principle of pension splitting on divorce. Options for dealing with the treatment of pensions on divorce will be dealt with in the Green Paper that we intend publishing in the summer.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has, in what time scale, to make regulations under section 149 of the Pensions Act 1995 to extend to occupational pension schemes his proposals for contracted-out money purchase payment schemes; [23128]

(2) by what date he will make regulations under section 149 of the Pensions Act 1995 to enable occupational pension schemes to be used for contracting out on a contracted out mixed benefits scheme. [23129]

Mr. Heald: We aim to lay regulations under section 149 of the Pensions Act 1995 before the summer parliamentary recess. From 6 April 1997 the intention is that newly contracted-out schemes will be able to contract out on a salary-related basis in respect of some members and a money purchase basis in respect of others. Existing contracted-out salary-related schemes will be able to change to contracted-out money purchase status without having to discharge their liabilities to provide salary-related benefits in respect of members' accrued rights. They will also be able to provide contracted-out money purchase benefits for some members and salary-related rights for others. Existing contracted-out money purchase schemes will be able to take advantage of the new flexibilities from April 1998. All these schemes will be known as contracted-out mixed benefit schemes or COMBS.

Family Credit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what percentage of those lone parents who were in receipt of family credit in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1993–94 received family credit for (i) 26 weeks only, (ii) 52 weeks only and (iii) more than 52 weeks; [22187]

(2) how many lone parents claimed family credit in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1993–94; [22189]

(3) how many couples claimed family credit in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1993–94; [22190]

(4) what was the total number of family credit claimants in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1993–94; [22191]

(5) of those couples in receipt of family credit in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1993–94 what percentage received family credit for (i) 26 weeks only, (ii) 52 weeks only and (iii) more than 52 weeks. [22192]

Mr. Roger Evans: The available information is set out in the table. To provide data on a comparable basis, it refers to recipients of family credit at the end of each financial year. This excludes awards beginning and ending during the year and therefore significantly underestimates the number and proportion of awards that last for 26 weeks only. The proportion with longer spells on family credit is thus over-estimated.

	Caseload (000)	Percentage of caseload with family credit in payment for 26 weeks	Percentage of caseload with family credit in payment for 52 weeks	Percentage of caseload with family credit in payment for more than 52 weeks
1992–93
All families	485	42.1	23.2	34.6
All lone parents	280	48.0	21.2	30.8
All couples	204	34.1	25.9	40.0
1993–94
All families	536	38.9	21.1	39.9
All lone parents	303	45.2	21.0	33.8
All couples	233	30.7	21.3	48.0

Notes:
1. Figures refer to awards in payment at the end of the financial year; and may exclude those who ceased have ceased to claim during the year.
2. All figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
3. Percentages have been expressed to one decimal place, and therefore may not tally.

Family Credit Computer System: 5 per cent. sample of all awards.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of children in Scotland aged (a) under five years and (b) five to 15 years living with lone parents were in receipt of family credit in (i) 1992–93 and (ii) 1993–94. [22188]

Mr. Evans: The available information is set out in the table:

Child aged	Number of children in families receiving family credit	Number as a percentage of children in Scotland
As at 31 March 1993
Under five years	11,000	3.5
Five to 15 years	37,000	5.2
As at 31 March 1994
Under five years	12,000	3.7
Five to 15 years	41,000	5.7

1. Figures refer to awards in payment at the end of the financial year and may exclude those who have ceased to claim during the year.
2. All figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
3. Percentages have been expressed to one decimal place and therefore may not tally.
4. The number of children has been calculated by reference to a 5 per cent. sample of the family credit computer system and the number of children in Scotland by reference to the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys mid-term estimates 1993 and 1994.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of children in Scotland aged (a) under five years and (b) five to 15 years from two-parent families were in receipt of family credit in (i) 1992–93 and (ii) 1993–94. [22193]

Mr. Evans: The available information is set out in the table:

Child aged	Number of children in families receiving family credit	Number as a percentage of children in Scotland
As at 31 March 1993
Under five years	17,000	5.4
Five to 15 years	37,000	5.2
As at 31 March 1994
Under five years	18,000	5.4
Five to 15 years	37,000	5.1

1. Figures refer to awards in payment at the end of the financial year; and may exclude those who have ceased to claim during the year.

War Pensions Disregard

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what are (i) the arrangements and (ii) the formulae for compensating local authorities for the mandatory £10 disregard of (a) war disablement and (b) war widows' pensions when assessing eligibility for council tax and housing benefit; [23209]

(2) how much his Department has paid in each of the last five years (i) in total and (ii) by local authority, to compensate local authorities for the mandatory £10 disregard of (a) war disablement and (b) war widows' pensions when assessing eligibility for council tax and housing benefit. [23210]

Mr. Heald: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 14 February, Official Report, column 654.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23636]

Mr. Burt: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. We take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive is in the course of preparation.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how may appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23616]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Performing Artists (National Insurance)

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assessment he has made of the impact on living standards of actors of the proposal to take actors out of eligibility for class 1 national insurance contributions; [24018]

(2) what consultations he has had with (a) theatre employers, (b) television employers and (c) actors' organisations on proposals to change actors' eligibility for class 1 national insurance contributions; [24019]

(3) if he will delay a decision on changes to eligibility rules concerning actors and class 1 national insurance contributions pending consultations with (a) theatre employers, (b) televisions employers and (c) actors' organisations. [24017]

Mr. Heald: In reviewing the national insurance position of actors, departmental officials have consulted the following organisations:

The Theatres' National Committee,

The British Broadcasting Corporation,

The ITV Network Centre,

The Producers' Alliance for Cinema and Television,

The British Actors' Equity Association.

In common with other occupations and professions, liability for the contributions paid by actors depends on the contractual nature of the engagement: that is, whether, under the law, it is employed earner's employment or self-employment. Employment status is decided without reference to any potential impact on the living standards of the individual concerned.

I am meeting representatives of Equity today, 1 April, and I am prepared to have further consultations with the industry if it seeks them.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the grounds for removing the right of performing artists to pay class 1 national insurance contributions; what external advice he took before making this decision; and what estimate he has made of the financial impact this move will have on (a) the national insurance fund and (b) the income support budget for the next five years. [23850]

Mr. Heald: This Department has generally regarded performers as employed earners. However, as a result of two tax cases before the special commissioners, the Inland Revenue now generally regards performers as self-employed and we are reviewing our position in the light of this change.

In reviewing the position, departmental officials have sought views from representatives both of performers and of the broadcasting, film, theatre and video industries.

Performing artists have no special rights to pay class 1 national insurance contributions: like other contributors, they are legally liable to pay the appropriate class of contribution depending on their employment status.

No reliable estimate is available of the effects on public funds of any widespread shift away from the payment of class 1 contributions by performers.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what benefit payment cards will be introduced for claimants of JSA; and what transitional arrangements will apply. [24150]

Mr. Heald: Jobseeker's allowance claimants will be issued with the same benefit payment card as other social security customers. Claimants of jobseeker's allowance will be paid by girocheque until they are converted to the benefit payment card which, on current planning assumptions, will commence in October 1997.

WALES

Morriston Hospital, Swansea

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the length of the delay in the start-up date for work on the accident and emergency department at Morriston hospital, Swansea; and to what extent this is due to the work being subject to the private finance initiative. [22963]

Mr. Richards: The start date for work in the accident and emergency department is dependent upon Morriston Hospital NHS trust completing its business case for a range of capital investments and securing approval from Lechyd Morgannwg health authority and the Welsh Office. Once the business case is approved, the trust will explore the opportunities for private sector investment, in line with all public sector capital developments. Any delay to the start can be quickly made up through speedy implementation of the works by a private sector partner.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what guidelines are currently in force in his department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within his Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases; [22856]

(2) how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by his Department and its executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if he will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by his Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22871]

Mr. Hague: The Government's public purchasing policy consolidated guidelines require goods and services to be acquired by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary. In addition, the EC procurement regulations and World Trade Organisation Government procurement agreement require most contracts above specified thresholds to be awarded following competition, subject to certain specified exceptions. the Treasury's central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 40 provides an overview of best practice in the competitive tendering process.

My Department requires senior officers to obtain written approval for single negotiated contracts valued above £1,000 from the head of finance programmes division, who is advised by the head of procurement. The Department's executive agency, Cadw, requires the agreement of its chief executive for single negotiated contracts valued above £10,000 and the agreement of the appropriate head of branch for those valued below £10,000.

Information on the number, value and percentage of single negotiated contracts awarded, the companies involved and the reasons why such contracts were awarded is not available in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Wetlands

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations his Department has recently received from Friends of the Earth, Cymru concerning wetland areas in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [23183]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: No such representation has been received.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the representations which he has received on the 1996–97 revenue support grant settlement. [23746]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend took account of all the representations made to the Welsh Office in making decisions on the 1996–97 local government revenue settlement. The decisions were approved by the House of Commons on 8 February.

Homelessness

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new measures he will take to tackle homelessness; and if he will make a statement. [23744]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There is a comprehensive range of measures in Wales to tackle homelessness and encourage the provision of suitable housing, especially for those least able to help themselves.

Our approach is working: homelessness in Wales is falling. In the nine months to 30 September 1995—latest figures available—the number of cases of homelessness accepted by Welsh local authorities fell by 13.9 per cent. compared to the same period in 1994. There was also a large reduction—44.6 per cent.—in the use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation at 30 September 1995 compared to the same point in 1994.

Energy Conservation

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's work in energy conservation. [23748]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office's energy and environment office provides businesses and other organisations with a wide range of support services on the efficient use of energy. These comprise free on-site visits; seminars; conferences and workshops; and availability of extensive best practice material and guides. The Office also supports the development of local energy and environment business action groups. Membership gives those concerned with energy management the opportunity to learn from others and broaden their knowledge and skills.

EDS Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what outsourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23741]

Mr. Hague: My agency—Cadw—does not have any outsourcing contracts with EDS.

Unmet Housing Need

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the backlog of unmet housing need. [23743]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Over 80 per cent. of households in Wales have expressed the wish to own their own home. Most housing needs are being met through the private market and I estimate that the completion of over 3,500 housing association homes in 1996–97 will go a considerable way towards meeting the need for subsidised housing.

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy that the nursery voucher scheme shall not apply in Wales. [23755]

Mr. Richards: No. The schemes will give parents in Wales a greater choice in the type of education they want for their four-year-olds, will stimulate diversity of provision and will act as a lever to raise standards.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list all those in his Department authorised to issue public interest immunity certificates; and if he will make a statement. [23820]

Mr. Hague: A claim to public interest immunity relating to departmental documents or information is usually made by the appropriate Minister.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23638]

Mr. Hague: None.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated costs will be. [23623]

Mr. Hague: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to table 3.17 of his departmental report, if he will set out the principal reasons for the difference between the target and the forecast outturn for completion of the Cardiff bay barrage construction contract at the end of the 1995–96 financial year. [23559]

Mr. Hague: The Cardiff Bay development corporation is reporting good progress on the barrage project. Expenditure in 1995–96 is now expected to be over £40 million, which is within 5 per cent. of the target figure set at the start of the year. I have asked the chief executive to provide the hon. Member with the principal reasons for the variations from the target figures set at the start of the year, once the final outturn figures are known. I will arrange for a copy of his response to be placed in the Library of the House.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the reasons for the time taken to direct the Local Government Boundary Commission to review the boundary between the Bridgend and Vale of Glamorgan county boroughs in the area from Coychurch to Ewenny. [24086]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The direction was issued on 6 February 1995, enabling the Local Government Boundary Commission, in preparing its initial draft proposals, to consult and take account of the views of the new unitary authorisation which were not elected until 4 May 1995.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 2 April 1996

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23645]

Mr. Freeman: I am arranging for a list of regulations which have been repealed or amended to date to be compiled and placed in the House Libraries. This will also include examples of the savings to business. Details of regulations still to be amended or repealed will be announced as and when consultations are completed.

EDS Computer System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what out-sourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23728]

Mr. Willetts: There are none.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24233]

Mr. Willetts: The Cabinet Office and its agencies have not entered into any out-sourcing arrangements with the EDS computer system.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24236]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service.

Official Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 14 December 1995, Official Report, column 750, if he will give a breakdown of the figure of £30,100 for official hospitality by his ministerial office and related agencies. [24445]

Mr. Willetts: The figure of £30,100 given in my answer of 14 December represented expenditure on official hospitality by the Cabinet Office, including the Office of Public Service, and its executive agencies—excluding HMSO—for the period 1 April 1995 to the end of November 1995. It was made up of £14,800 expenditure by the Cabinet Office—excluding the Prime Minister's Office—£4,000 by OPS agencies and £11,300 by the Central Office of Information.

Mr. Banks: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister, pursuant to the answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 693, for whom the two dinners at Lancaster house were held; how many people attended; and what was the cost in each case. [24428]

Mr. Willetts: The Deputy Prime Minister hosted the dinners in question in order to discuss a range of competitiveness issues with a mix of senior public and private sector representatives. Seventeen people attended the first dinner, at a cost of £1,118.36. Eighteen attended the second, at a cost of £1,163.41.

The Deputy Prime Minister has also hosted one other lunch at Lancaster house, and a dinner at another venue, for a total of 22 people, from a similar range of backgrounds and to discuss other issues relating to national competitiveness, at a total cost of £1,204.53.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Deputy Prime Minster to what extent (a) he and (b) his office has a role in the co-ordination of answers from Ministers to parliamentary questions tabled by hon. and right hon. Members. [23778]

The Deputy Prime Minister: As Chairman of the Ministerial Committee on the Co-ordination and Presentation of Government Policy, I have in place procedures for co-ordinating the handling of linked parliamentary questions put to a number of departmental Ministers and parliamentary questions put to one Government Department where the subject matter is of wider interest to the Government as a whole. In each case, it is for the departmental Minister to take responsibility for the answer. The co-ordinating procedures are designed to secure consistency and efficient handling of those questions which extend beyond the field of responsibility of individual departmental Ministers.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what is his role in the framing of answers to parliamentary questions to other Government Departments. [23719]

The Deputy Prime Minister: My role is confined to those cases where the subject matter of a question put to another Government Department cuts across the responsibilities of several Departments including my own, or has been brought to the attention of the Ministerial Committee on the Co-ordination and Presentation of Government Policy, which I chair, as a matter of wider interest to Government as a whole. In such cases, the lead Department would liaise with the Committee, and with other interested Departments, over the terms of the answer. In each case, it is the departmental Minister who has responsibility for the final answer.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Civil Enforcement Agents Review

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the progress of the review of civil enforcement agents. [24699]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The discussions referred to in my written answer of 29 June 1995, Official Report, column 741, have now concluded. Following careful consideration of the proposals which emerged from these discussions, I believe that the best way of achieving a proper and professional service for creditors and debtors lies in a package of initiatives specifically focused on the areas of concern identified in the course of the review.

I therefore intend to implement a range of measures that will increase creditors' access to enforcement by the sheriffs while increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the county court bailiff service for those who continue to use it. At the same time, my Department will be working with other Government Departments and relevant bodies to modify and strengthen the certification procedure for other bailiffs and to ensure that redress is both available and accessible for those aggrieved by the actions of private bailiffs.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EU Council

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union. [24012]

Mr. David Davis: The answer is as follows:

Government Code and Cypher School

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current location of the Government code and cypher school (a) original decrypts of German army and air force Enigma traffic and (b) SMA original decrypts in the Japanese military attaché series. [23841]

Mr. Rifkind: The Government communication headquarters—GCHQ—released reports based on Government code and cypher school decrypts of wartime German army and air force messages to the Public Record Office in January 1996 under reference HW5. Reports based on decrypts of Japanese military attaché messages were released in April 1995 under reference HW10. In many cases, the original decrypts were destroyed when the reports were issued, or soon after, and the Public Record Office has stated that it has no requirement for GCHQ to release the few original decrypts that still exist.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to release original Government code and cypher school Enigma decrypts to the Public Record Office. [23842]

Mr. Rifkind: GCHQ has already released to the Public Record Office—PRO—a considerable amount of Government code and cypher school signals intelligence and related documents, including the reports based on Enigma decrypts which were passed to Churchill from 1941 onwards. GCHQ is continuing to review its records from the second world war and earlier, with the aim of releasing as many as possible. The answer which I gave to the hon. Gentleman earlier explained that the few remaining decrypts are not required by the PRO.

Colombia

Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is Her Majesty's Government's assessment of the human rights situation in Colombia; and if the UK will be raising the issue of human rights in Colombia at the 52nd UN Commission on Human Rights; [23823]

(2) what measures he intends to take to address the human rights situation in Colombia at the UN Commission on Human Rights. [23824]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We take a close interest in the human rights situation in Colombia. The Colombian Government are making efforts to improve the situation, but the high level of violence, the guerrillas, narco-traffickers and unauthorised actions by the security forces cause problems. At the UN Commission on Human Rights, the presidency will deliver a statement on behalf of the European Union reviewing the human rights situation in several specific countries, including Colombia.

European Parliament

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, columns 409–10, on how many days the D2 building in Brussels was used for plenary sessions in (a) 1995 and (b) 1996. [24104]

Mr. David Davis: The European Parliament held plenary sessions in Brussels on 12 days on 1995 and will meet there on 16 days in 1996. The D2 building also contains offices and committee rooms and is in continuous use.

BBC World Service

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans Her Majesty's Government have to review the proposed reductions in the BBC World Service's grant for 1997–98; and what representations he has received in support of the proposed reductions. [23816]

Mr. Hanley: The amount to be made available as grant in aid for the BBC World Service in 1997–98 will be considered along with all the other Government expenditure, during the 1996 public expenditure round, later this year.

The Government receive many representations in support of reduced public expenditure generally, but are not aware of any specifically relating to the BBC World Service.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23657]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer on 19 March, Official Report, column 112, if he will place in the Library a copy of the guidelines on broadcasting issued by the St. Helena Government. [23573]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: These guidelines are a confidential internal document drawn up by the Government of St. Helena for use in the Government broadcasting service. It would not, therefore, be appropriate to place them in the Libraries of the House. Media arrangements in St. Helena are under review by the St. Helena Government.

Cuba

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with Governments in the Caribbean region about the United States Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act. [24108]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have discussed the issue with the Mexican Government. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary expects to discuss it with Governments in the region when he visits later this month.

Travel Immunisation Service

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the proposed privatisation of the travel immunisation service. [24182]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Under-Secretary of State for Health today.

Government Communication Headquarters

Mr. Meale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if a meeting between the chair of the Government Communications Staff Federation and civil service unions is permitted under the conditions laid down in CCHQ general notice—GN100/84. [24395]

Mr. Rifkind: GCHQ general notice GN 100/84 was superseded on 20 December 1995 by another notice, PCN 12/95, which, in accordance with my written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) on that day, Official Report, columns 1191–92, relaxed the restrictions on trade union membership at GCHQ while still upholding the Government's concerns regarding the protection of national security. Like GN 100/84, PCN 12/95 places no constraints on a meeting between the chairman of the Government Communications Staff Federation and the civil service unions.

Commonwealth Co-ordination Division

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff are currently in post in the Commonwealth co-ordination department; and what are their grades. [24217]

Mr. Hanley: There are seven permanent staff in the FCO's Commonwealth co-ordination department. Their grades are as follows, with home civil service equivalents in brackets: diplomatic service grade 4 (HCS5), DS5 (HCS7), DS7 (HEO), DS9 (EO), DS10 (AO), S2 (personal secretary) and executive assistants (no equivalent). Prior to the biennial Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting, the Departments's staff increased by some 50 per cent. to handle the United Kingdom preparation for those meetings.

Ms Louise Stack

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now make representations to the Spanish Government about their failure to implement the terms of the treaty between the United Kingdom and that country on the transfer of convicted prisoners in the case of Ms Louise Stack.

Mr. Hanley: There is no bilateral treaty between Spain and the UK on the transfer of convicted prisoners. We are not aware of any failure by the Spanish authorities to observe the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons in the case of Ms Louise Stack.

Ms Stack was released from prison in Spain on conditional liberty on 26 March.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Zanzibar

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on British aid to Zanzibar. [24587]

Mr. Hanley: We have decided that, in present circumstances, we should not continue with our programme of development assistance to Zanzibar. This reflects our concern about the way in which the outcome of the Zanzibar Government elections in October 1995 was handled, and disturbing reports of post-election political polarisation and harassment of some sections of the community. We do not believe that the current environment is conducive to the effective implementation of a development programme. This decision does not preclude the resumption of further assistance to Zanzibar when circumstances have improved.

Global Environment Facility

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to receive copies of the first annual report of the global environment facility; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [24589]

Mr. Hanley: Copies of the first annual report of the global environment facility have recently been received. A copy has been placed in both Libraries of the House.

Zambia

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Zambian Government about future elections, with particular reference to the banning of individual candidates; and if he will make a statement. [23913]

Mr. Hanley: We have made clear to the Government of Zambia our concern about possible amendments to the constitution which would exclude the leader of the main opposition party from standing for the presidency in the elections due later this year.

DEFENCE

Joint Headquarters

4. Mr. Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the role of the permanent joint headquarters. [22308]

Mr. Portillo: The permanent joint headquarters, which I shall formally open tomorrow, will enhance the ability of the three armed services to plan for the conduct of joint operations and to carry them out, including command of the new joint rapid deployment force when it is deployed.

Peacekeeping

5. Mr. Ashby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the role of British forces' contribution to peacekeeping operations world-wide. [22309]

Mr. Soames: There are some 10,500 ground troops with the NATO peace implementation force in Bosnia, supported by 1,200 other personnel. We are also making important contributions to United Nations peacekeeping operations around the world.

Defence Spending

7. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on Britain's position in the UN Security Council of reducing the United Kingdom's defence spending to the European average. [22311]

Mr. Portillo: Reducing defence spending to the current NATO European average would involve cuts of over £4.5 billion per year. This would have a gravely damaging effect on our armed forces and on their ability to carry out operations, including those carried out under the auspices of the UN Security Council.

Royal Yacht

15. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements will be made to mark the last visit of the royal yacht to Cowes; and if he will make a statement. [22320]

Mr. Soames: Events to mark the last visit of HYM Britannia to Cowes have yet to be decided.

Nuclear Deterrent

16. Mr. Thomason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the United Kingdom will retain its independent nuclear deterrent. [22321]

Mr. Soames: We shall maintain a minimum independent nuclear deterrent for as long as is necessary for this country's security.

Gaelic Athletic Association

17. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department will now restore to the Gaelic Athletic Association the full use of its ground at Crossmaglen. [22322]

Mr. Soames: Crossmaglen Gaelic Athletic Association club has full use of its pitch and other facilities. A small proportion of the club's land is held under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991 and forms part of the joint police and Army base in Crossmaglen. This will continue for as long as the security situation demands.

Art Collection

18. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to recover missing parts of his Department's art collection; what new security measures are in place to avoid further losses; and what plans he has to commission new art works to replace those lost from his departmental budget. [22324]

Mr. Artbuthnot: We will continue to make every effort to recover missing works of art by a renewed search of our buildings.

Works of art are safeguarded by securing the rooms in which they hang, asking staff who occupy those rooms to verify that the rooms are safe and by inspections by staff responsible for works of art.

We have no plans at present to commission new works of art.

Exports

19. Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assessment he has made of the performance of the British defence industry in export markets. [22325]

Mr. Arbuthnot: British defence equipment manufacturers continue to enjoy success in the export market. In 1995, they won contracts worth about £5 billion, giving UK an estimated world market share of 19 per cent.

23. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the British defence industry's performance in export markets in the last three years. [22329]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Over the last three years—1993 to 1995—UK defence equipment export orders have been worth almost £17 billion.

Royal Auxiliary Air Force

20. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress he is making to increase the number of aircrew in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force. [22326]

Mr. Soames: Members of the Royal Auxiliary Air Force do not currently serve as aircrew. The RAF has, however, conducted trials to assess the feasibility of recruiting and training volunteer reservist aircrew. The trials were conducted on the Hercules aircraft at RAF Lyneham, and the Wessex helicopter at RAF Benson. The trials were completed earlier this year and the RAF is currently assessing the results.

Nimrod Reconnaissance Aircraft

21. Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to make a decision concerning the replacement of the Nimrod maritime reconnaissance aircraft. [22327]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We expect to award a contract for the RAF's replacement maritime patrol aircraft in the late summer.

Atomic Weapons Establishment, Llanishen

22. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the costs and benefits of disposal of the atomic weapons establishment, Llanishen, Cardiff, subsequent to closure. [22328]

Mr. Arbuthnot: There will be no further defence requirement for the Cardiff factory after 1997. Prior to the decision to close it, an assessment was made of the associated costs and benefits. The former consist mainly of severance payments and decommissioning costs. The benefits to my Department will be felt in terms of reduced annual expenditure.

RAF Manpower

24. Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total manpower of the RAF in 1990; and what is his estimate of the strength of the RAF by the end of the decade. [22330]

Mr. Soames: The total strength of the RAF on 1 April 1990 was 89,685. The estimated strength for 1 April 1999 is some 55,500. Both figures include personnel undergoing training.

Greenham Common

25. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has held with English Nature regarding the return of runways at Greenham Common to heathland. [22331]

Mr. Soames: The removal of concrete from the runways at Greenham Common and the restoration of heathland was agreed between officials of my Department and English Nature prior to the commencement of work.

Porton Down

26. Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about recent changes to the structure and functions of the chemical and biological defence establishment at Porton Down. [22332]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The function of the chemical and biological defence establishment remains unchanged. It provides Her Majesty's Government with advice on the threat posed by chemical and biological weapons and carries out research to ensure that the United Kingdom's armed forces are provided with safe and effective protection. Since 1 April 1995, CBDE, with the chemical and electronic systems sector, has been a division of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. On 1 April 1996, CBDE is being renamed the protection and life sciences division. At the same time, it will be expanded to include the centre for human sciences based at Farnborough, which will incorporate the defence radiological protection service based at Alverstoke. The mission for the new division will be to provide a comprehensive and integrated approach to protecting the human being in military environments and optimising their military effectiveness.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

27. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy concerning the negotiation of a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. [22334]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We are negotiating in good faith a comprehensive test ban treaty with the aim of establishing an effectively verifiable treaty commanding universal adherence as soon as practicable.

Equal Opportunities

Ms Church: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to ensure equal opportunity for women in the armed forces. [22305]

Mr. Soames: There are very few roles in the services which are closed to women and the armed forces are committed to ensuring equality of opportunity for women, consistent with the need to maintain combat effectiveness.

Departmental Contractors and Suppliers

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures his Department is taking to ensure that its contractors and suppliers (a) pay their employees a wage which ensures such employees do not need supplementary welfare payments via various state benefits and (b) meet workplace health and safety regulations; and if he will make a statement. [21457]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Terms and conditions of employment, including wages, are a matter between the contractor or supplier and his employees, subject of course to any relevant legal requirements. Compliance with health and safety regulations is a legal requirement for the contractor or supplier. My Department has a corresponding obligation to notify contractors if work to be performed involves the use of dangerous articles of substances.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total cost of answering parliamentary questions in each parliamentary Session since 1989–90. [22899]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department does not collect this information.

Supermarine Spitfire Aircraft

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department intends to take to celebrate the diamond jubilee of the first flight of the Supermarine Spitfire aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [23071]

Mr. Soames: In response to requests from event organisers, RAF aircraft, principally from the Battle of Britain Memorial Flight, are involved in a number of civil events marking the historic achievement of the first flight of the Vickers Supermarine Spitfire.

Guatemala (Training)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what involvement his Department has had in the military training of Guatemalan Government armed forces in Guatemala. [23193]

Mr. Soames: We have had no involvement in the military training of Guatemalan armed forces in Guatemala, but have provided assistance with English language training.

Exercise Arid Thunder

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what nation was the sponsor of the Arid Thunder exercise. [23441]

Mr. Soames: The United Kingdom sponsored Exercise Arid Thunder 95–96.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many sorties were flown by each squadron involved in Exercise Arid Thunder; and how many (a) BL755 and (b) other weapons were dropped by each squadron during the exercise. [23538]

Mr. Soames: The number of sorties flown and BL755, 3 kg and 14 kg practice bombs dropped during Exercise Arid Thunder, by squadron, was as follows:

Unit	Sorties	BL755	3 Kg PB	14 Kg PB
13 Squadron	93	139	50	—
14 Squadron	95	140	—	22
17 Squadron	131	137	75	30
617 Squadron	115	140	37	38

Tornado Aircrew (Live Weapons)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many live BL755 weapons RAF Tornado aircrew are required to drop each year in order to maintain combat-ready status. [23449]

Mr. Soames: There is no specified number of live BL755 weapons which Tornado aircrew are required to drop in order to maintain combat-ready status.

Remotely Piloted Vehicle (Llanbedr)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the remotely piloted vehicle authorised to fly in the Llanbedr danger area on 6 January 1995 was recovered; and what were the times of take-off and landing of the aircraft. [23439]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Defence has asked me to reply to your question about a remotely piloted vehicle flight in the Llanbedr danger area on 6 January 1995. Llanbedr is a Defence Test and Evaluation Organisation (DTEO) site and hence part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA).

The Jindivik remotely piloted aerial target launched from the DTEO site at Llanbedr on 6 January 1995 was recovered; its take-off time was 1024 hours and its landing time was 1055 hours.

I hope this is helpful.

Submarine Flotilla

Sir Jim Spicer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements are in place for the support of the submarine flotilla. [23447]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Since the announcement in October 1993 of the Government's intention to sell the royal dockyards, a series of separate negotiations has been conducted with Babcock International Group for the proposed sale of Rosyth Royal Dockyard plc and with Devonport Management Limited for the proposed sale of Devonport Royal Dockyard plc. Negotiations have also proceeded with DML on the related issue of the construction of facilities at Devonport for the refitting and refuelling of nuclear submarines, project D154.

I am pleased to say that, today, my Department signed two heads of agreement with DML and its shareholders. The first, in respect of the proposed sale of DRD plc, covers the general principles which would apply to a sale agreement. The second, for the provision of nuclear refuelling and refitting facilities at Devonport, places on the contractor whose project manager will be Brown and Root (UK) Ltd., the responsibility for delivery of facilities that are licensable, operable and fit for purpose, whilst providing ample opportunity for industry to compete for work at the sub-contract level. A key issue in the negotiations has been the risk transfer and the contractor has accepted to bear an unprecedented proportion of the risk. The agreements must now be converted into binding contracts.

My Department is today issuing a memorandum of information to the trade unions about the position as regards the future management arrangements for Devonport Royal Dockyard, and will then initiate a formal process of information and consultation.

Negotiations are at an advanced stage with Babcock International Group on the proposed sale of Rosyth Royal Dockyard plc. The outcome will be announced as soon as possible. Short-term extensions to the current contracts in operation at both Rosyth and Devonport dockyards, which would otherwise expire on 5 April 1996, are being arranged to cover the period of further negotiations. The Government have confirmed, subject to reasonable prices, a programme of refitting work for Rosyth for Royal Navy vessels stretching to the year 2006, and to include two aircraft carriers and a substantial number of other major war vessels.

Cyprus

Mr. John. D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Greek Cypriots and (b) Turkish Cypriots are employed at each of the two United Kingdom sovereign bases in Cyprus. [23681]

Mr. Soames: As at 29 February, there were 1,240 Greek Cypriots and no Turkish Cypriots employed in the western sovereign base area. In the eastern sovereign base area, there were 577 Greek Cypriots and 306 Turkish Cypriots employed.

Auxiliary Oil Tankers

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place contracts for new auxiliary oil tankers; when the ships are intended to enter service; what specification is planned in terms of speed and endurance; how many helicopters will be carried; whether the ships will carry dry stores or weaponry; what order of cost is envisaged; what consideration was given to the use of the private finance initiative; and if he will make a statement. [23582]

Mr. Arbuthnot: An invitation to tender was issued on 2 February 1996 for up to two auxiliary oilers for order around the turn of the year. The first vessel is expected to enter service in early 2001. The specification will meet the latest environmental safety standards and provide a capability for replenishment of warships with fuel and a limited range of solid stores while under way and the operation of a single Merlin-sized helicopter. A speed in excess of 18 kts is required and the ship will possess a limited self-defence capability to allow it to operate with front-line naval forces in peace and war; it will also be able to receive the Phalanx close-in weapons system. The private finance initiative was judged to be inappropriate for the operational role envisaged for these ships. Costs cannot be provided as they are commercial-in-confidence at this stage in the competition.

Tornado Accident (Germany)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what height above ground level the Tornado involved in an accident in Germany on 10 May 1991 was found to have been flying at the commencement of the manoeuvres which led to control loss. [23440]

Mr. Soames: The aircraft's final manoeuvre was a level turn, which it entered at a height of 1,075 ft above ground level.

Weapons Ranges

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those weapons ranges in the United Kingdom where delivery of live BL755 weapons is authorised. [23448]

Mr. Soames: No RAF weapons ranges in the United Kingdom are cleared for the delivery of live BL755 munitions, although the Defence Test and Evaluation Organisation's range at West Freugh is cleared for the release of BL755 for trials purposes.

Gas Pipeline

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the sequence of events and the meetings and correspondence which preceded Premier Transco digging the Scotland-Northern Ireland gas pipeline in 1995. [23984]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 6 February 1996, Official Report, columns 121–23.

Key Personnel (Travel)

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy regarding the air transport of key personnel travelling together to minimise the risk of loss. [24129]

Mr. Soames: Our policy remains that a judgment must be made in each case to assess the very remote possibility of a flying accident against the operational and other advantages that this form of travel provides.

Munitions Dumping (Solent)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 March 1996, Official Report, column 512, if he will place in the Library documents which relate to the dumping of surplus munitions in St. Catherine's Deep off the Isle of Wight or other small-scale munitions dumps in the Solent. [23982]

Mr. Soames: No. Complete records of munitions disposal are no longer available and St. Catherine's Deep, although shown on hydrographic charts, may have had only limited or emergency use, if at all. There is no surviving evidence of other munitions dumps in the Solent.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will survey the St. Catherine's munitions dump for reasons of public safety. [23983]

Mr. Soames: There are no plans to survey St. Catherine's Deep. Current scientific evidence indicates that munitions dump sites present no significant risk to safety, human health or the marine environment, if left undisturbed.

Bedenham Jetty

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, columns 510–11, if he will list the purposes for which Bedenham jetty was used after 1966. [24220]

Mr. Soames: Bedenham jetty has been, and continues to be, used to transfer armament stores between the storage and maintenance depot Gosport to RN ships, the Royal Fleet Auxiliary and between other armament depots by naval armament vessels.

Defence Export Services Organisation

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the current offset adviser and international finance adviser at Defence Export Services Organisation, (b) the companies from which they are seconded, (c) the duration of their appointments and (d) the bonuses to which they are entitled. [24078]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The current offset adviser is Mr. Barry Teidman, a civil servant and not a secondee. The international finance adviser, Mr. Miles Faulkner is a fixed-term appointee and is also not a secondee but his previous company was Trafalgar House. Mr. Faulker was originally appointed on 1 April 1992 and his appointment has been extended until 31 March 1997. Both are eligible for any performance-related pay awards which may be agreed for their grades, but no specific bonuses are attached to the posts.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the net cost of the Defence Export Services Organisation in each year from 1988 to the present. [24079]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The net cost of the Defence Export Services Organisation for each year from 1988 was as follows:

Year	Net cost of DESO £ million
1988–89	(12.23)
1989–90	(15.99)
1990–91	(17.63)
1991–92	11.05
1992–93	11.89
1993–94	16.02
1994–95	10.94
1995–96 (estimated)	16.81

In the years 1988–89 to 1990–91, receipts exceeded costs because the proceeds from sales of surplus equipment were not disagregated to the services concerned.

Permanent Secretary (Visits)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the visits outside Britain made by the permanent secretary to his Department on official business within the last 12 months indicating the date and purpose of the visit in each case. [24191]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Since 1 April 1995 the permanent under-secretary of my Department has made the following overseas visits:

Date	Country	Purpose
28–30 April 1995	Germany (Munich)	Attend conference organised by the Ditchley Foundation
29 August–3 September 1995	Malaysia (Kuala Lumpur)	Commonwealth Association for Public Administration and Management (CAPAM) followed by conference
19–20 October 1995	Belgium (Brussels)	Visit to UK Delegation and International staff at NATO HQ
14–15 January 1996	Germany (Oberammergau)	Keynote address to NATO Defence Planning symposium
2–4 February 1996	Germany (Munich)	Attend Wehrkunde conference on security issues
2–7 March 1996	Pakistan (Islamabad)	Co-chair inaugural meeting of the UK/Pakistan Defence Cooperation Forum
14–15 March 1996	Bosnia/Croatia	Visit to UK personnel deployed with IFOR

War Memorials

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the names of service personnel killed in Northern Ireland can be placed on local war memorials in Great Britain. [24370]

Mr. Soames: My Department has no objections to the names of service personnel killed in Northern Ireland being inscribed on dedicated memorials.

Departmental Purchases

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the Army has a very urgent requirement for 55,500 rounds of 30 mm AFV TP-T (Practice) L18A2 ammunition as listed as future purchase number ART 2A/10 in MOD contracts bulletin volume 10, number 112 dated 21 February; and if he will make a statement. [22256]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The annual training requirement for the 30mm AFV TP-T practice round was expected to reduce following the introduction of the new discarding sabot reduced range round in 1995–96. Changes in the production timetable of the DSRR have resulted in the need to train with the TP-T round instead and, therefore, to replenish stocks earlier than expected.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for which forces there is a requirement for eight electronic support measure/direction finding stations as listed as tender number ISIS2A/017 in MOD contracts bulletin, volume 10, number 12, dated 21 February; and if this requirement is to replace existing equipment. [22257]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The requirement for the equipment specified in tender number ISIS2A/017 in MOD contracts bulletin, volume 10, number 12 dated 21 February, is to support the Army's activities in Bosnia as part of the NATO implementation force. The equipment to be provided is intended to meet the operation requirements of the deployment to Bosnia and is not intended to replace any existing Army equipment.

Future Attack Submarine

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what assumption for an in-service date for the future attack submarine tender number NSM13C/60167 in MOD contracts bulletin, volume 10, number 12, dated 21 February was issued in respect of pre-feasibility concept studies for the combat system. [22258]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The future attack submarine, currently the subject of concept studies, is intended to replace the Trafalgar class submarines early in the next century.

Matrix Churchill Trial

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussion he had with Alan Moses QC before the collapse of the Matrix Churchill trial. [22392]

Mr. Arbuthnot: None. Mr. Moses's only contact with the Department was in order to review MOD papers which may have been relevant to the case. Details are set out in Sir Richard Scott's report.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23651]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The MOD is not a regulator of business and has not therefore identified any such regulations. My Department continues to play a full role in the deregulation initiative by focusing efforts on relieving unnecessary administrative burdens on suppliers, streamlining contracts procedures, and improving communications with industry.

Quantock School

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 18 December, Official Report, column 982, if he will make a statement about the review of pastoral care arrangements at Quantock school carried out by the Service Children's Education Authority; if he will place a copy of its findings in the Library; and what arrangements have been made to convey the findings of the SCEA to parents of service children at the school. [24206]

Mr. Soames: Two Office for Standards in Education-qualified SCEA staff visited Quantock school on 21 February 1996. Based upon their observations, it is SCEA's view that pastoral and guidance arrangements at Quantock school are entirely adequate with no obvious areas of concern. SCEA will continue to advise service parents in the normal way that Quantock school is suitable for attendance by service children.

SCEA staff visit independent schools by invitation to assess pastoral care arrangements for service children; they have no statutory right of access. Visit reports are therefore written on the understanding that they remain for internal use only.

Dental Charges

Mr. Mans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the introduction of dental charges for civilian staff, their dependants and the dependants of service men overseas. [24544]

Mr. Soames: We intend to bring practice in regard to dental charges overseas into line with that in the United Kingdom. Hence we have decided to introduce, with effect from 1 June, charges for dental treatment provided by overseas service dental establishments and by civilian practices in overseas locations without service facilities, to UK-based civilian staff, their dependants, and the dependants of service personnel. Charges will be in line with those fees currently charged to NHS patients in the United Kingdom. Normal exemption rules will apply. Additionally, dependants of gurkhas serving in Hong Kong will be exempt from these charges, as will service dependants who are serving and residing in Hong Kong, and UK-based civilians and their dependants who are also serving and residing in Hong Kong.

Service Personnel (Pay)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current levels of pay for both the highest and lowest paid service personnel; what were the rates in real terms in May 1979; and if he will make a statement. [22608]

Mr. Soames: The rates of pay for the highest and lowest paid personnel for May 1979 and April 1996 are as follows:

	May 1979	1 April 1996
Five-star (Field Marshal etc.)	24,936.00	124,640.20
Junior entrant (under 17)	1,766.60	5,438.50

In the period since May 1979, the retail prices index, which is the recognised comparator for real-terms pay increases, has increased by 177.9 per cent. Meanwhile, pay for the most senior officer has risen by 399.8 per cent. whereas pay for junior service personnel has increased by 207.9 per cent. These figures indicate that all service personnel, including junior entrants who have yet to attain adult status, are now better off when compared with the RPI, than they were in 1979.

TREASURY

Goods and Services

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the rate of return on (a) manufacturing in the United Kingdom and (b) other industrial and commercial enterprises producing goods and services in the United Kingdom for each year since 1970. [22961]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information on United Kingdom rates of return for (a) manufacturing industrial and commercial companies and (b) all industrial and commercial companies is available from the Office of National Statistics' central shared database and is published in the ONS's first release (95)136, "Profitability of UK companies". This is available from the Library of the House.

VAT (Political Parties)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many Customs and Excise investigations there have been during each of the last five years, and this year to date into the VAT returns made by (a) the Conservative research department and (b) the Labour research department. [23130]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Under Customs care and management of the tax and their duty of confidentiality, it is not the policy of the Department to divulge information of this kind relating to individual registered entities.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be; [23611]

(2) which of the 1,000 regulations identified for appeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23644]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 April 1996]: I refer to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave to my hon. Friend on 1 April 1996, Official Report, column 18.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23629]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying directive.

Unemployment

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage and number of unemployed in each EU country at the latest date for which figures are available. [24029]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information on both the level and rate of unemployment in each EU country can be found in labour force survey results, published by the statistical office of the European Community—SOEC. Unpublished data relating to 1994 are given in the table below. More up-to-date estimates of the rate of International Labour Organisation unemployment, not the level, in each country can be found in the SOEC's monthly "Unemployment Bulletin" which is available in the House of Commons Library; the estimates for December 1995 are shown in the table.

ILO unemployment numbers and rates in EU countries

	December 1995[1] Rate(Per cent.)	Spring 1994[2] Number(000)	Rate(Per cent.)
Spain[1]	22.2	3,760	24.3
Finland	17.0	—	—
Ireland	14.6	206	14.6
Italy	12.6	2,560	11.3
France	11.6	3,149	12.7
Belgium	10.3	400	9.6
Sweden	9.7	—	—
Greece	9.4	368	8.9
Germany	8.6	3,427	8.7
United Kingdom	8.6	2,741	9.7
Portugal	7.3	319	6.7
Netherlands	6.7	517	7.2
Denmark	6.1	222	8.0
Luxembourg	4.0	6	3.5
EU total	10.9	17,676	11.4

Manufacturing Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the unit value of United Kingdom exports of manufactures for each quarter since 1974, the weighted average unit values for the main manufacturing countries less the United Kingdom and the index of United Kingdom competitiveness measured against those countries. [22966]

Mr. Oppenheim: I have been asked to reply.

Where available, the unit value indices data are published in the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics". A measure of relative export prices is published in table 2.15 of "Economic Trends". Both publications are available on the central shared database, which can be accessed from the Library of the House.

PRIME MINISTER

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals Her Majesty's Government plan to introduce to the intergovernmental conference on openness; what response has been made to the Swedish Government's proposals for right of access to official documents; and if he will place in the Library a copy of all proposals submitted by EU member state Governments and received by him to the IGC on openness. [23818]

The Prime Minister: We are committed to greater openness in the European Union and have already supported a number of proposals to achieve this. We are considering our policy on openness in the intergovernmental conference, including how to respond to the Swedish ideas for a treaty right of access to official documents. We have already placed in the Library material from other Governments setting out their policy at the intergovernmental conference, including on openness.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 April. [22607]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 2 April. [22609]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

No. 10 Downing Street (Receptions)

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the dates on which the receptions were held for (a) the 45th winter ball and (b) the 46th winter ball. [24272]

The Prime Minister: A reception was held at No. 10 Downing street for the 45th winter ball on 7 November 1994.

The reception for the 46th winter ball was not held at No. 10 Downing street.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all the functions and the dates on which they took place which were held at No. 10 Downing street since November 1990 where the costs have been met by (a) the winter ball, (b) the City and Industrial Liaison Council and (c) any of the regional industrialists councils which raise funds on behalf of the Conservative party. [24271]

The Prime Minister: Two functions have taken place where the costs were met by the winter ball. These were on 8 December 1993 and 7 November 1994. There have been no functions where the costs have been met by the City and Industrial Liaison Council or any of the regional industrialists councils which raise funds on behalf of the Conservative party.

Intelligence and Security (Committee Report)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what action he proposes to take on concerns prompted by the Ames case and tainted intelligence referred to in paragraph 32 of the Intelligence and Security Committee report, Cm 3198; [24294]

(2) pursuant to paragraph 35, what action he proposes to take on significant lapses in the procedures for the briefing of Ministers as referred to in paragraph 32 of the Intelligence and Security Committee report, Cm 3198. [24295]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to my letter of reply to the chairman of the Intelligence and Security Committee at the front of the report in which I said:

"In the light of what your report said about the Ames case, and as you suggested at our meeting, I have myself reviewed the evidence given to you. I feel satisfied that Ministers were adequately briefed on this case and that, on the evidence so far available, damage to United Kingdom interests was not great. But these are serious issues and I look forward to seeing your conclusions following your further investigations into these matters."

HOME DEPARTMENT

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23612]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 1 April 1996]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 1 April, Official Report, column 18.

Banned Drugs

Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will add gamma hydroxy butyrate to the list of banned drugs. [21963]

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 21 March 1996]: This substance is not currently under the control of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, but I am asking the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs to give the matter further consideration.

British Citizenship

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what forms of political extremism are taken into account when applications for British citizenship are considered. [23843]

Mr. Kirkhope: In cases where the grant of British citizenship is discretionary, all aspects of an applicant's activities that might be relevant to the requirement that he is of good character are taken into account.

Prisoners (Mandatory Drug Testing)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners over the last 12 months have tested positive for using class C drugs as a result of mandatory drug testing; and if he will make a statement. [23828]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 2 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question regarding the number of prisoners who have tested positive for using class C drugs in the last 12 months.

Between February 1995 and January 1996 there were 186 random test results positive for benzodiazepines, the group of class C drugs for which tests are made. Results for February 1996 are not yet available.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners over the last 12 months have tested positive for using class B drugs as a result of mandatory drug testing in (a) England and (b) Wales; and if he will make a statement. [23710]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 2 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners who have tested positive for using class B drugs in England and Wales during the last 12 months.

In English prisons, between February 1995 and January 1996, there were 2400 random test results positive for cannabis, amphetamines and barbiturates, the class B drugs tested for. The two Welsh prisons which began testing in December have had 17 positive random test results for class B drugs. Results for February 1996 are not yet available.

Doncaster Prison

Mr George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what negotiations have taken place between Premier Prison Services Ltd. and the Prison Service since the contract was signed, to alter (a) the catchment areas and (b) the courts from which prisoners are drawn; what decisions were made as a result of those negotiations; and on what dates; [23243]

(2) to alter the terms under which particular prisoners can be transferred out of Doncaster; how many prisoners have been transferred under renegotiated terms; for what reason; and on what dates. [23244]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. George Howarth, dated 2 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about what negotiations have taken place between Premier Prison Services Ltd and the Prison Service since the contract was signed to alter (a) the catchment areas; (b) the courts from which prisoners are drawn; and (c) the terms under which particular prisoners can be transferred out of Doncaster. You also asked what decisions were made as a result of those negotiations and how many prisoners have been transferred under renegotiated terms; for what reason and on what dates.

There have been no negotiations and no change to the catchment area and therefore no change to the courts from which prisoners are drawn.

No change has been made to the transfer arrangements. Doncaster prison is a local prison and its function, as with other local prisons, is to hold prisoners who are remanded into custody and to ensure they are taken to courts in the catchment area for trial purposes. After conviction and sentence Doncaster prisoners, in common with other similar prisoners held in local prisons, are allocated to a training prison establishment, as vacancies arise.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the complement of full-time and part-time staff by grade employed at Her Majesty's prison, Doncaster on the first day of every month since December 1995; what proportion of the staff costs were met by the Prison Service under the terms of the contract with Premier Prison Services Ltd; and what proportion were met by the company. [23241]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Person to Mr. George Howarth, dated 2 April 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the complement of staff at Doncaster prison.

The table below shows the complement of full-time and part-time staff (excluding sub-contractors) employed at Doncaster prison on the first day of each month since December 1995.

With the exception of the three Prison Service personnel at Doncaster prison, all staff (excluding sub-contractors) are employed by Premier Prison Services Ltd and funded through the contract fee paid by the Prison Service for the management of Doncaster prison. The deployment of these staff by grade is a matter for the company.

Month	Full-time staff	Part-time staff
December 1995	449	14
January 1996	449	18
February 1996	449	18
March 1996	449	18

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the complement of full-time and part-time staff employed at Her Majesty's prison, Doncaster on 20 June 1994; and what was the complement of full and part-time staff by grade on 20 March. [23242]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 2 April 1995:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about staffing levels at Doncaster prison on 20 June 1994 and 20 March 1996. The complement of full and part-time staff at Doncaster prison was as follows:

Date	Full-time staff	Part-time staff
20 June 1994	356	0
20 March 1996	449	18

The grading of staff is commercial-in-confidence under the terms of the relevant contract.

Police Funding

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account (a) the present and (b) the planned future funding formulas for the police take of levels of unemployment; and if he will make a statement. [23114]

Mr. Maclean: Police funding is distributed by means of a population-based formula. In common with the formulae for other locally delivered services, the police funding formula also takes account of a number of socio-demographic variables including unemployment. In both 1995–96 and 1996–97, less than 1 per cent. of police funding will be redistributed on the basis of unemployment indicators.

Special Constables

Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on the number of special constables in each division; and how many hours have been worked by them each month during the most recent 12-month period for which figures are available. [23160]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that it is not possible to break down the figures for hours worked into monthly periods. For April 1994 to March 1995, the latest period for which the total figure is available, special constables in the Metropolitan police worked a total of 407,102 hours. The number of special constables on each division is given in the table.

Police Stations and Houses

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police stations and (b) police houses, per police force there were in each of the last 10 years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [23113]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of police stations is not collected centrally. Information on police houses is available only for the last four years and is set out in the table. Further information on the number of police houses is published annually in "Police Statistics" by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, copies of which may be found in the Library.

Dangerous Dogs Act 1991

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will write to police forces reminding them of the list he has already circulated, compiled by the British Veterinary Association and the Kennel Club, which provides the names of individuals with expert knowledge who may be well equipped to identify dogs which may be suspected as being covered by section 1 of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991; and what assessment he has made as to whether reference to such individuals could (a) save public money and (b) reduce distress. [24205]

Mr. Sackville: Guidance on the list of individuals prepared to give advice as to whether a particular dog appears likely to fall within section 1 of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 was set out in the Home Office circular issued in February 1994 to all police forces in England and Wales. It remains extant and we have no evidence to suggest that police forces generally are unaware of the guidance contained in the circular.

Decisions from whom to seek advice in this regard is an operational decision for the chief officer of police. Clearly, the early identification of whether a dog is covered by section 1 of the 1991 Act should be of benefit to all concerned in a case.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will now review the effectiveness of the transfer of the convicted prisoners treaty between the United Kingdom and Spain; [24387]

(2) how many British citizens convicted abroad, in countries with whom the United Kingdom has treaties on the transfer of convicted prisoners, have been returned to the United Kingdom to complete their sentences in the last five years, listed by country; [24391]

(3) with which countries Her Majesty's Government have agreed arrangements for the transfer of convicted prisoners to complete their sentences in their country of residence and, by country, the date upon which such arrangements came into effect; [24393]

(4) how many foreign nationals, convicted in courts in England and Wales, have been returned to their country of residence to complete their sentences under the terms of treaties on the transfer of convicted prisoners, in the last five years, broken down by country. [24392]

Miss Widdecombe: Her Majesty's Government are a party to two international agreements allowing for the repatriation of prisoners to serve their sentences in their own countries. The main international agreement is the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons, which was instituted in 1983. At present, there are some 31 other countries that conduct repatriation under this scheme.

There is also a Commonwealth scheme for the transfer of convicted offenders to which five other countries are signatories. The United Kingdom also has bilateral agreements with Egypt and Thailand. The countries party to these agreements, and the dates on which they came into force for each country, are listed in the table.

Repatriation between the United Kingdom and Spain is governed by the Council of Europe convention on the transfer of sentenced persons and its procedures. There are no plans to review these arrangements.

[1] Although the majority of those repatriated here are British citizens, the United Kingdom will accept non-citizens who have close family ties in this country and meet immigration requirements. Figures held centrally refer only to the total number of repatriations and do not distinguish between British citizens and non-citizens.

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners currently serving prison sentences in Great Britain have requested a transfer to prisons in Northern Ireland or the Irish Republic; [23543]

(2) what is his policy on the transfer of Irish prisoners from gaols in Great Britain to prisons in Northern Ireland. [23544]

Miss Widdecombe: The policy governing the transfer of prisoners between United Kingdom jurisdictions, including those between England and Wales and Northern Ireland, was set out in a statement on 23 November 1992, Official Report, column 476.

Any request by a prisoner in England and Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland to be transferred to one of the other jurisdictions either permanently, to serve the rest of his or her sentence, or temporarily to foster family ties, will normally be approved, provided that (1) the prisoner would have at least six months left to serve in the receiving jurisdiction before his or her date of release at the time of making the request; (2) the prisoner was ordinarily resident in the receiving jurisdiction prior to the current sentence; or his or her close family currently reside there and there are reasonable grounds for believing that it is the prisoner's firm intention to take up residence there on release or to receive visits; and (3) both Departments concerned are reasonably satisfied that the prisoner will not, if transferred, disrupt or attempt to disrupt any prison establishment, or otherwise pose an unacceptable risk to security. A request that does not meet these conditions may nevertheless be granted where there are strong compassionate or other compelling grounds for transfer.

A permanent transfer may, however, be refused if it is considered that the prisoner's crimes were so serious as to make it inappropriate that he or she should benefit from a substantial reduction in time left to serve, if that would be a consequence of transfer.

Requests will be considered on an individual basis. To facilitate the orderly movement of small numbers of prisoners between jurisdictions, the timing of each transfer will be subject to operational and security considerations in the sentencing and receiving jurisdictions.

Temporary transfer, where granted, may be for a period of up to 12 months, with requests for extensions of this period considered on a similar basis. Temporarily transferred prisoners will be expected to comply fully with such regime requirements as the receiving Secretary of State may stipulate. Failure to agree to do so either in making the request or after transfer will normally justify refusal of the request or the immediate return of the prisoner to the sentencing jurisdiction.

As of 27 March, 18 requests for transfer to Northern Ireland and 70 requests for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland made by prisoners in England and Wales were under consideration. In addition, three requests for transfer to Northern Ireland made by prisoners in Scotland were under consideration. No requests for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland have been made by prisoners in Scotland.

Euro 96

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his Department's preparations for Euro 96. [24264]

Mr. Maclean: The Association of Chief Police Officers has developed plans in conjunction with the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the Football Association, the Home Office, the Department of National Heritage, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of Transport, the Football Licensing Authority and the Football Trust. A group comprising representatives of these various bodies meets regularly. Ad hoc discussions with other agencies have also taken place.

There will be a national police co-ordinating centre in central London with links to eight regional centres being set up in the same areas as the football stadiums hosting the matches. Representatives from the police forces of each of the participating nations will be present to assist with dealing with any problems that may arise in respect of the visiting fans.

Key features of these plans include the use of modern technology to transmit images of those involved in any disorder quickly to the regional centres; the use of closed circuit television at the stadiums to contain incidents before they can get out of hand; and the use of police intelligence officers or "spotters" to assist in the identification of known hooligans. Any persons intending to cause disruption will be identified and dealt with swiftly.

A European working group has been established to help with the development of the policing plans. We are confident that, with the great amount of effort being put into this competition, Euro 96 should prove to be an enjoyable and thrilling event for the hundreds of thousands of spectators who are expected.

Football Hooliganism

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Affairs Department if he has asked Europol to assist in the measures to tackle football hooliganism in the EU. [23736]

Mr. Maclean: No. Neither the remit of the Europol drugs unit nor the Europol convention extend to football hooliganism. However, the United Kingdom's good practice guidelines that were adopted by the European Union on 19 March emphasised the importance of European police co-operation and contained measures for promoting this.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many substantive asylum appeals have been heard since 10 November 1995 involving appellants from (i) Nigeria and (ii) Bosnia in which appeals were allowed by special adjudicators or in which his Department decided to withdraw from the appeal. [23513]

Mr. Kirkhope: Reliable information for the period could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers were subject to detention under the Immigration Act 1971 for more than 28 days at any time during 1995. [23514]

Mr. Kirkhope: To provide the information requested would involve disproportionate cost. The most recent available information was given in a reply to a question from the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson) on 20 February, Official Report, columns 101–102.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications from (a) Somalia, (b) Afghanistan, (c) Iran, (d) Iraq, (e) Bosnia, (f) Croatia and (g) the former Yugoslavia are in the backlog of undecided asylum applications in his Department; and how many of these applications from each country have been waiting more than two years for a decision. [23510]

Mr. Kirkhope: An estimated breakdown of those asylum applications awaiting an initial decision as at 31 December 1995, by year of application, is given in the table.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the asylum appeals withdrawn in 1993, 1994 and 1995 were (a) withdrawn by his Department and (b) withdrawn by the appellant; and in how many of the latter cases the appellant had been granted leave to remain on grounds not raised in the appeal. [23512]

Mr. Kirkhope: Fifty asylum appeals were withdrawn in the period August to December 1993—the period in 1993 after the Asylum Act 1995–255 in 1994 and 1,000 in 1995. Information on the reasons for withdrawal could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Omar Bakri Mohammed Fostok

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has had about the political activities of Omar Bakri Mohammed Fostok born in 1958 in Aleppo, Syria. [23735]

Miss Widdecombe: We have received eight letters about Mr. Omar Bakri Mohammed Fostok. It would be contrary to our normal practice to disclose the details of them.

Immigration Application Forms

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make the use of application forms compulsory for foreign nationals wishing to apply for leave to remain in the United Kingdom. [24591]

Mr. Kirkhope: I have today laid an immigration rules change which will make the use of application forms for a variation of leave to enter or remain compulsory from 3 June. I have placed copies of the forms I have prescribed in the Library. The scheme will not cover applications under European Community law or applications for asylum. The immigration and nationality department has been operating a voluntary trial of application forms since June 1995. Experience of the trial has shown that the forms enable us to provide a more efficient service to genuine applicants at a cheaper cost to the public purse. A more efficient system will also improve the immigration control.

European Common Visa List

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to implement the European common visa list. [24592]

Mr. Kirkhope: We have today laid a statement of changes to the immigration rules which implements the European Union common visa list. With effect from 4 April, nationals of Bahrain, the Dominican Republic, Fiji, Guyana, Kuwait, the Maldives, Mauritius, Niger, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Qatar, Suriname, United Arab Emirates and Zambia will require visas to visit the United Kingdom in addition to those countries of whose nationals visas are currently required.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the total expenditure of his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies on publicity for each of the years (a) 1979–80, (b) 1989–90, (c) 1991–92, (d) 1993–94, (e) 1994–95 and (f) 1995–96 (i) to date and (ii) as estimated for the whole year; what estimate he has made of such expenditure for 1996–97; and if he will break these figures down to indicate expenditure on (1) advertising and (2) press and public relations. [11400]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 25 January 1996]: The information requested for the Northern Ireland Office, Northern Ireland Departments and their agencies is listed.

£000

Year	Advertising	Press and public relations
1979–80	[1]469	[2]282
1989–90	7,863	1,401
1991–92	10,567	1,660
1993–94	7,814	1,898
1994–95	8,088	1,968
1995–96 (to date)	5,263	1,677
1995–96 (estimate)	8,856	2,078
1996–97 (estimate)	[3]8,774	2,186

[1] Expenditure not available from Departments of Economic Development and Agriculture.
[2] Covers expenditure by Departments of Finance and Personnel, Agriculture and Education.
[3] Budget for 1996–97 not yet known in Department of Education.

Information on non-departmental public bodies could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Action for Community Employment

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures will be taken by other Government Departments to make good the shortfall in the ACE budget. [21876]

Mr. Ancram: No specific measures are being taken by other Government Departments at present. However, a transitional package of £2 million to be provided by the Training and Employment Agency for ACE schemes has already been announced which recognises the immediate problems faced by organisations dealing with many of the needy in Northern Ireland and will enable them to make an orderly contraction of their operations.

Prisoners (Transfers)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the arrangements by which residents of Northern Ireland, and foreign nationals convicted of criminal offences in Northern Ireland, may apply for transfer to their home countries outside the United Kingdom to complete their sentences; and how many such transfers have been made in each of the last five years. [24390]

Sir John Wheeler: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Prison Service under its chief executive, Mr. Alan Shannon. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from B. R. D. White to Mr. Robin Corbett, dated 2 April 1996:

In the absence of the Chief Executive, the Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your parliamentary question regarding government policy in respect of the repatriation of prisoners to and from Northern Ireland.

The repatriation of prisoners to and from the United Kingdom is governed by the Repatriation of Prisoners Act 1984. Repatriation may be considered where the country to which application is being made is a signatory to the Council of Europe Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons or to the Commonwealth Scheme for the Transfer of Convicted Offenders or has a bilateral agreement with the United Kingdom.

To be eligible for repatriation a prisoner must have received his final sentence for an offence which is a criminal offence under the law of the receiving country, be a national of that country or have close family ties there and as a general rule have at least six months of his sentence to serve at the time of application. Repatriation requires the consent of both jurisdictions and the prisoner concerned. In considering whether to accept a request for repatriation to another jurisdiction it has been the policy of Her Majesty's Government not to agree to a transfer where such a move would result in a substantial reduction in time left to serve.

In the past five years no prisoner convicted of an offence committed in Northern Ireland has requested to be repatriated to another jurisdiction. No applications for repatriation to Northern Ireland have been received in the same period.

Breast Cancer

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which of the recommendations of the third report of the Health Committee of Session 1994–95, HC 324, on breast cancer services he has implemented; and what sums he has allocated for further implementation of the recommendations. [23782]

Mr. Moss: Many of the recommendations are being taken forward at national level. Specific recommendations in relation to services have been considered by the cancer working group, which was established to review the current provision of cancer services in Northern Ireland and to make recommendations as to how the services can be improved for all cancer patients. I hope to be in a position to make a statement on this in the near future.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the figures for breast cancer among women in each range for which figures are collated; and if he will make a statement on the incidence of breast cancer in Northern Ireland relative to other parts of the United Kingdom. [23784]

Mr. Moss: Information on deaths from breast cancer is detailed in the tables. This shows that the death rate is lower in Northern Ireland than in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Annual average deaths from breast cancer by age in Northern Ireland 1989–93

Age	Average deaths

Wales	64.9	69.1	70.8
Scotland	63.8	62.2	63.6
Northern Ireland	65.6	59.1	56.6

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will commission research into the incidence of breast cancer among women who have their first child after age 30 years; if he will arrange for publicity about the incidence; and what proposals he has for preventive monitoring schemes. [23785]

Mr. Moss: There are no plans at present to commission such research. Information about incidence is included in publicity for both the breast screening programme and general health promotion programmes of health and social services boards and trusts. The breast screening programme is continuously monitored in order to maintain and improve its effectiveness.

General Practitioners

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the whole-time equivalent number of NHS general medical practitioners working in each health and social services board area in Northern Ireland at the latest date for which figures are available. [24385]

Mr. Moss: The information requested is given in the table.

Number (whole-time equivalent) of unrestricted principal general medical practitioners in contract with health and social services boards at 1 March 1996

Health and social services boards	Unrestricted principals (WTE)
Eastern	389.25

Government Purchasing Agency

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in establishing the Government purchasing service of the Department of Finance and Personnel as a next steps agency. [24593]

Sir John Wheeler: The Government purchasing service of the Department of Finance and Personnel was established as an executive agency on 1 April 1996. It will be known as the Government Purchasing Agency.

I have set a number of key performance targets for the agency to achieve in its first year. These are as follows:

- to achieve total quality through having 100 per cent. of contracts covered by service level agreements established between the agency and its customers meet the standards set out in the White Paper "Setting New Standards—A Strategy for Government Procurement", Cmnd 2840;
- to achieve through cost reduction and cost avoidance methods at least 3 per cent. value for money improvements in procurement spend;
- to achieve a 75 per cent. qualified procurement staff;
- to respond to 85 per cent. of requests for advice on procurement policy within one working day and the remainder within three working days;
- to achieve 100 per cent. of regulated contracts conforming to purchasing regulations as monitored by University of Ulster surveys;
- to complete preparation for trading fund status by end of March 1997; and
- to establish a supplier forum with representatives of small and medium-sized businesses by September 1996, that will ensure initial business participation of at least 30 per cent.

Copies of the framework document, which sets out the terms within which the agency will operate, have been placed in the Library, along with its first corporate and business plan.

Ballycastle-Campbeltown Ferry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the ferry service between Ballycastle and Campbeltown will commence operation; and if he will make a statement. [23817]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have been asked to reply. The target date for the commencement of the proposed new ferry service, set by the sponsors of the project, Argyll and the Islands Enterprise and Moyle district council, is 1 May 1997, subject to the availability of the terminals at both Campbeltown and Ballycastle. The Government are considering the proposal made by the project sponsors that Caledonian MacBrayne should be allowed to operate the service and fully recognise the need for an early decision on this matter.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

EDS Computer System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Attorney-General what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24231]

The Attorney-General: The departments for which I am responsible have not entered into any arrangements with Electronic Data Systems.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

EDS Computer System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what out-sourcing contracts her agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should she seek early termination of the contract; and if she will make a statement. [23742]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage and its agencies have no out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what savings to date have been made by her Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment she has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if she will make a statement. [24238]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage and its agencies have no out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Royal Palaces

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans there are to reduce the entitlement of private secretaries and officials in the royal households to residential accommodation in the occupied royal palaces; over what time scale; and how much accommodation will be released and in which palaces. [22103]

Mr. Sproat: It is envisaged that 45 private secretaries and officials in the royal household will no longer be provided with residential accommodation when the present postholders leave or retire; 12 of these occupy the following properties, which are outside the security cordons and can therefore be let commercially or sold. The date when it is assumed that the present occupants will retire are also given:

Date	Flat/House	Property
1996	1 flat	Royal Mews, Hampton Court
2000	1 house	Royal Paddocks, Hampton Court
	1 house	Old Barracks, Kensington
2002	2 flats	Marlborough House Mews
	1 house	Chantry Close, Windsor
2003	1 flat	Marlborough House Mews
	1 flat	Old Barracks, Kensington
2006	1 flat	Marlborough House Mews
2011	1 flat	Old Barracks, Kensington
	1 house	Royal Paddocks, Hampton Court
2016	1 flat	Cumberland Lodge Mews, Windsor

The 33 properties within the security cordon will not be available for commercial letting or sale. Their future use will be determined when the present postholders leave or retire.

Television Licence Fees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many of those fined for failure to pay television licence fees in Wales have been imprisoned over the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [23192]

Mr. Sproat: The number of people imprisoned by courts in Wales for non-payment of fines for television licence evasion in each of the last five calendar years, is as follows.

1992 21

1993: 51

1994: 49

1995: 61 (provisional figure).

Owing to changes in statistical analysis, earlier year figures may be understated.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the total cost of prosecuting those fined for failure to pay television licences in (a) 1985, (b) 1990, (c) 1992, (d) 1994 and (e) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [23185]

Mr. Sproat: The information requested is not available.

National Armouries Collection

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many staff (a) lost their employment and (b) started employment in the move of the national armouries collection to Leeds. [23541]

Mr. Sproat: As a result of the move of a large proportion of the Royal Armouries collection to the new museum in Leeds, two staff have been made redundant by the Royal Armouries and a further 12 staff who were offered continued employment in Leeds have declined it. At Leeds, the Royal Armouries has recruited six new permanent staff and its private sector partners have recruited 259 permanent staff. The private sector partners expect to recruit a further 50 seasonal staff this summer.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the recent proposals and representations she has received concerning elderly sheltered accommodation which does not currently qualify under the television concessionary licence scheme. [23530]

Mr. Sproat: We receive regular representations about various aspects of the concessionary television licence scheme, both from Members of Parliament and from members of the public. However, no records are held in the form requested.

Tourism (Fire Regulations)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has had from the English tourist industry regarding the application of the Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988 (a) to hotels of all sizes and (b) to self-catering accommodation; and if she will make a statement on the reasons for all exceptions in these categories. [23578]

Mr. Sproat: The Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988 are primarily the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. I have had no representations about the application of the 1988 regulations to hotels. Hotels are subject to the Fire Precautions Act (Hotels and Boarding Houses) Order 1972, made under the Fire Precautions Act 1971.

The 1988 regulations apply to furniture supplied as part of self-catering accommodation let out in the course of a business for holiday or leisure purposes. I have had a number of representations from self-catering tourist accommodation providers, but none during the past 12 months. As a result of representations about the considerable cost of compliance, the Government made, in 1993, an amendment to the 1988 regulations giving self-catering accommodation providers until 31 December 1996 to replace furniture which does not meet the fire resistance requirements, provided that the furniture has already been supplied as part of accommodation previously let.

Sport (Administrative Structure)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what recent representations she has received about the administrative structure for sport; and if she will make a statement. [22255]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 April 1996]: We have received a number of representations, notably from the Sports Council, about its reorganisation into two new councils for England and for the United Kingdom.

Mental Patients (Television Licences)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received on the need to change the regulations concerning television licences for private properties housing mental patients who have been placed there by the local NHS mental health trusts; what plans she has to reconsider these regulations; and if she will make a statement. [23207]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 April 1996]: We are not aware of any representations on this subject, nor do we have any plans for changes to the television licensing regulations.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proportion of a television licence fee a mental health patient has to pay if (a) a resident in accommodation eligible for a residential care television licence and (b) housed in a property which fulfils all the requirements necessary for a residential care television licence, but is not directly provided or run by a local authority or housing association. [23208]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 April 1996]: As from 1 April 1996, the cost of full fee television licences is £89.50 for colour and £30 for black and white. These full licence fees are payable by mentally disordered persons unless all the qualifying criteria for a £5 residential accommodation care licence are met. These criteria include detailed requirements about how the accommodation is provided or managed. This does not necessarily need to be by a local authority or housing association.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23618]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 April 1996]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given on 1 April 1996 Official Report, column 18, by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if she will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps she is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23635]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended, and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if she will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23653]

Mr. Sproat: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

TRANSPORT

Transport Research Laboratory

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to complete the privatisation of the Transport Research Laboratory. [24543]

Mr. Norris: The sale of the Transport Research Laboratory to the Transport Research Foundation for some £6 million was completed on 31 March.

Thameslink 2000

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his oral statement of 27 February, Official Report, columns 723–24, in what ways Thameslink 2000 will enhance access to airports. [24758]

Sir George Young: The statement on 27 February, Official Report, columns 723–24, indicated that Thameslink 2000 would enhance access to Stansted and Gatwick airports.

Thameslink 2000 is a project to enhance existing infrastructure and expand the current Thameslink network. The benefits include a significant increase in capacity, a substantial reduction in journey times, the provision of direct access to the City of London from a great number of destinations north and south of London, an interchange with channel tunnel rail link services and with the services of seven train operators and eight London Underground lines, including the Jubilee line extension.

Gatwick airport and Luton airport are both on the Thameslink route and thus are well placed to benefit from the increased opportunities Thameslink 2000 provides. However, access to Stansted airport will not, as the statement suggested, be enhanced by the project. Direct links to Stansted, and to Heathrow, would require additional infrastructure, electrification and junction changes. These are not part of current Thameslink 2000 plans. It would be a matter for Railtrack, its customers and the franchising director to examine the case for such enhancements, and to take worthwhile proposals forward.

Railways (Subsidy)

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the Government's policy on the provision of subsidy for socially necessary passenger railway services. [24759]

Sir George Young: The Government remain firmly committed to providing the subsidy needed to support socially necessary passenger railway services at broadly the present level of service provision. In my instructions to the franchising director, I have made it clear that, when setting passenger service requirements for services being franchised for the first time, he should take as his starting point the service being provided at the time. The passenger service requirements which will be incorporated in franchise agreements will set out the services which franchisees will be contractually committed to operate. The Government are committed to providing support for at least those levels of service.

Light Dues

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on light dues. [24786]

Mr. Norris: I am pleased to announce that light dues for 1996–97 will remain at the level set in April 1993 for the third year in succession. Accordingly, no changes to the light dues regulations are needed.

Once again, I commend the general lighthouse authorities for their continuing commitment to the achievement of greater efficiency in their work.

Crossrail

Dr. Twinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the crossrail project. [24760]

Sir George Young: I believe that crossrail has the potential to bring worthwhile benefits to London's transport system. As I indicated in my recent statement to the House on Thameslink 2000, Official Report, columns 723-24, I expect crossrail to come after the Jubilee line extension, Thameslink 2000 and the channel tunnel rail link. That is a sensible sequence of major new rail projects for London.

I have therefore asked the chairmen of London Transport, Railtrack and British Rail not to proceed for the time being with an application under the Transport and Works Act 1992 for powers to build crossrail. I have also invited the chairman of Railtrack to consider the project further with his board once Railtrack is in the private sector, in the light of the Government's continued firm policy that crossrail should proceed only as a joint venture with a substantial private sector contribution.

London Regional Transport (Funding)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if his proposals for legislation to permit London Regional Transport and its subsidiaries use of the private finance initiative include public notification of (a) tenders for any such scheme, (b) successful contracts and their financial details and (c) maximum period of their operation; [24440]

(2) if, in his proposals for legislation to permit London Regional Transport or its subsidiaries use of the private finance initiative, transfer of ownership to the successful bidders for any scheme or contract, of land, equipment or facilities will be permanent or for the period of the contract only; and if the period of that contract will be made public. [24441]

Mr. Norris: The London Regional Transport Bill does not require London Transport or its subsidiaries to publish information about their projects under the private finance initiative. Invitations to tender will continue to be published where this is a legal requirement. I understand that London Transport will normally announce the award of such contracts, giving an indication of their value and duration where this information is not commercially sensitive.

When a contract ends, assets transferred from London Transport to the contractor at the beginning of the contract will generally be transferred to a new contractor, or will revert back to LT until a new contract can be let. Assets no longer needed by LT may remain with the contractor, and LT already has powers to make such disposals.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23649]

Mr. Watts: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Sea Empress Incident

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost, calculated to date of (a) the salvage operation and (b) the clean-up operation onshore and offshore following the Sea Empress grounding on 15 February. [24261]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Nick Ainger, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Question about costs associated with the Sea Empress grounding on 15 February.

The details of the costs of the salvage operation are not being collated by the MPCU as the bills for the charges which the salvors incurred are being sent directly to them.

The cost of the at-sea clean up to date, which includes the charter of oil skimming and recovery vessels, surveillance and spraying aircraft, dispersant purchase, manpower and the hire of equipment, is £1,845,605. There are still a number of invoices yet to be received.

Beachcleaning operations are still ongoing in a number of locations. To date the MPCU have been invoiced for a total of £1,094,356.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what attempts were made to remove oil from the Sea Empress in the period after she had grounded; and if he will make a statement. [23579]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. David Nicholson, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the SEA EMPRESS incident.

Removal of the oil from the SEA EMPRESS while she was in the entrance to Milford Haven was an option which was under continual active consideration. During the incident conditions were rarely suitable for what would have been a difficult and potentially hazardous operation. When the conditions were suitable all effort went into refloating the vessel so that she could be lightened in a safer place.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ask Lord Donaldson to conduct a detailed and independent inquiry into the Sea Empress disaster. [22060]

Mr. Norris: The marine accident investigation branch is conducting a detailed and independent investigation into the cause of the grounding of the Sea Empress and the conduct of the subsequent salvage operations. Assessments are also being undertaken into the environmental effects of the pollution caused by the Sea Empress and into the effectiveness of the clean-up techniques which were employed. Consideration of the need for any further examination of the incident or its effects will be given when the findings and recommendations of the MAIB investigation and the environmental assessment are available.

Rail Safety (Hidden Report)

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps have been taken to ensure the recommendations of the Hidden report are implemented throughout the rail industry. [24259]

Mr. Watts: As the enforcing authority for safety on the railways, the Health and Safety Executive's railway inspectorate monitors closely the implementation of the recommendations contained in Sir Anthony Hidden's report.

A20 Roadworks, Aycliffe

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made on the completion and tidying up of the A20 roadworks in and around the Aycliffe area; and if he will make a statement on the proposed new car park for residents. [24242]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. David Shaw, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking what progress is being made on the completion and tidying up of the A20 roadworks in and around the Aycliffe area; and if he will make a statement on the proposed new car park for residents.

The tenders for a contract to complete and tidy up the A20 roadworks were returned on 29 March. We expect work to commence this month.

The proposed new car park is a Dover District Council scheme which the Highways Agency has agreed to include in the contract subject to the Council's agreement to meet the additional cost.

Trunk Roads and Motorways

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library copies of external legal advice he has received in respect of the application of the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 to his proposed new agency arrangements for trunk roads and motorways. [24103]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Ms Joan Walley, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your question about whether copies of the external legal advice we have received in respect of TUPE would be placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

We have not considered it necessary to seek such external legal advice in relation to our new agency arrangements for the management of the trunk road network. Our policy for dealing with TUPE has been developed in close liaison with departmental lawyers. We have consistently stated that we do not consider it appropriate for the Highways Agency to comment on whether TUPE would apply when the new agencies are introduced. We do however appreciate that tenderers for the new agencies will require employee information in order for them to assess the implications of the TUPE Regulations on their bids. We are considering how such information could be made available.

Speed Recording Cameras

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations have been made to his Department regarding the safety hazard to oncoming drivers of the flashing lights associated with speed recording cameras when used on single carriageways, with particular reference to the A3 between Wandsworth and the underpass leading to the dual carriageway to the south and west. [24138]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Peter Griffiths, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about the hazard to oncoming drivers of the flashing lights associated with speed recording cameras on single carriageways, and especially with reference to the camera positioned on the A3 between the Tibbets Corner underpass and Roehampton Lane.

No representations have been received about the safety hazards to oncoming drivers from the speed recording camera's flashing light at this particular location.

A speed camera takes two shots of the rear of a vehicle if it is travelling faster than a set speed. On a single carriageway road the camera will be pointing downwards towards the nearside. Oncoming traffic will be aware of the flashes but drivers should not be blinded, even if they are looking directly into the camera because of the downward direction of the light beam and because the brightness of the beam breaks down rapidly on either side of the focus. When selecting sites for speed cameras and when positioning them, one of the main factors under consideration is the possibility that oncoming drivers may be blinded. All steps are taken to make sure that this does not happen.

You will wish to know that I have arranged for this camera to be inspected to ensure that it is working properly.

Milford Haven

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the normal number of tugs ordered for (a) tankers berthing at Milford Haven and (b) tankers sailing from the port of Milford Haven. [17892]

Mr. Norris: The number of tugs ordered will depend on factors such as the size of the tanker, its manoeuvrability and the prevailing weather conditions. I understand that the Milford Haven port authority has issued the following general guidelines for tankers berthing and leaving Milford Haven.

Tanker deadweight (tonnes)	Number of tugs advised
Over 15,000	1 or 2
15,000–65,000	2
65,000–100,000	3 or 4
100,000–150,000	4
Over 150,000	5

Tankers under 15,000 tonnes deadweight do not generally take tugs unless weather conditions and berthing difficulties dictate.

Substandard Tankers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers a port authority has to refuse (a) entry and (b) loading to tankers found to be substandard; and when such powers have been used since 1966. [17894]

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) on 6 March, Official Report, columns 213–14. Records of the use made of these powers are not held by the Department.

Coastguard Buildings

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the amount paid to the HSB contractor for the care and maintenance of Coastguard agency buildings in each of the last five years. [22359]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Ms Joan Walley, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the amount paid to the HSB contractor for the maintenance of Coastguard Agency buildings.

PQ 1590/95/96

The Coastguard Agency contract with HSB began on 1 April 1993. Contract expenditure for the last three years has been as follows:

1993–94: £312,855

1994–95: £268,759

1995–96: £288,581.

These figures are exclusive of VAT, and do not include payments for work commissioned outside the terms of the contract as payments made to HSB for these unforseen/emergency works also include the sub-contractors fee.

Weather Reports

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the current arrangements concerning payments to Coastguard personnel from the Meteorological Office in relation to the weather readings the Coastguard personnel provide. [22358]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Ms Joan Walley, dated 2 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about arrangements concerning payments to Coastguard personnel for weather readings.

Volunteers on selected Coastguard stations, both permanent staff and Auxiliary Coastguards, receive a retainer from the Meteorological Office for the provision of weather observations. They are trained by and paid direct by the Meteorological Office.

Oil Tankers

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will undertake a study of the advantages of requiring any bulk oil tanker over a specific capacity bound for discharge at a port in the United Kingdom to be equipped with a bow thruster of minimum power related to its gross tonnage. [21138]

Mr. Norris: We are continually assessing the benefits of oil tanker design and specification, both within the Department of Transport and within the International Maritime Organisation, in which the Government take an active role. Although bow thrusters can improve the manoeuvring in port, we have no evidence to indicate that they offer sufficient advantages to justify a study into whether they should be a requirement for all oil tankers entering UK ports.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of NVQs at each level have been awarded by each awarding body in each year since their introduction. [23084]

Mr. Paice: Due to a confidentiality agreement between the National Council for Vocational Qualifications and the awarding bodies, information showing the number or percentage of awards made by each awarding body is not available.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many full NVQs have been awarded at each level in each year since their introduction; and how many awardees were mostly or wholly trained for these awards in (i) further education or sixth form colleges, (ii) secondary schools, (iii) private training providers and (iv) other enterprises. [23085]

Mr. Paice: Information on the number of NVQ awards made at each NVQ level, broken down by year, is available from NCVQ and is shown in the following table. By the end of 1995, the total number of awards made at each level were: 262,000 at level 1; 613,000 at level 2; 126,000 at level 3; 42,000 at level 4; and 2,000 at level 5.

Comprehensive information on the type of centre at which the awardee was trained is not available.

Bishop Challoner School

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when Bishop Challoner school entered into franchise agreements with Solihull college; and what is the current status of those agreements. [23522]

Mr. Robin Squire: I understand that the school entered into a franchise arrangement with Solihull college from September 1994 and that it ended in July 1995.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the head teacher and bursar of Bishop Challoner school were suspended; and if she will make a statement on the finances of the school. [23520]

Mr. Squire: The school's external auditors have raised concerns about the school's draft 1994–95 accounts. In the light of that, the school's governing body, on the instruction of the Funding Agency for Schools, appointed outside consultants, Robson Rhodes, to help draw up a recovery plan which will also report on the precise financial position of the school.

The school's governing body took the decision to suspend the headteacher and the bursar on 15 February 1996 and to call in the police to investigate its concerns about some aspects of the management of the school's finances.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) when Bishop Challoner school applied to change its status from an 11-to-16 to an 11-to-18 years school; what objections have been received in respect of the application; when these were received; and what is the current position with regard to that application; [23519]

(2) what has been the response of the Further Education Funding Council to the application from Bishop Challoner school to change to an 11-to-18 school. [23450]

Mr. Squire: The governors of Bishop Challoner Roman Catholic grant-maintained school published proposals on 28 March 1995 to make a significant change in the character of the school by changing the age range from 11-to-16 to 11-to-18 with effect from 1 September 1996. The Further Education Funding Council and Birmingham local education authority submitted statutory objections to the proposals on 4 and 24 May 1995 respectively. The proposals are currently under consideration.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was Bishop Challoner school's overspend at the time grant-maintained status was granted; and what were the financial implications of this for the local education authority. [23523]

Mr. Squire: The Funding Agency for Schools determined the school's annual maintenance grant for 1993–94, taking into account the financial position of the school when it became grant maintained on 1 October 1993. I have asked the chairman of the funding agency to arrange for a reply to be sent to the hon. Member.

Careers Service

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received that the careers service does not provide advice to school leavers about the opportunities for self-employment; and if she will make a statement. [23581]

Mr. Paice: I met representatives from the Princes youth business trust on 7 February and this matter was discussed. The Secretary of State requires careers services to provide school leavers with advice on the full range of education, employment and training options, including self-employment and the financial help available to support it. Careers services must help their clients to make decisions which are appropriate in their individual circumstances.

Sixth Forms (Birmingham)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list all 11-to-16 schools in Birmingham that have franchise agreements with sixth form and further education colleges enabling them to open sixth forms. [23451]

Mr. Robin Squire: I understand that the following 11-to-16 schools have franchising arrangements with institutions in the Further Education Funding Council sector: Selly Park girls' school, Holy Trinity Roman Catholic school, Holyhead school, Aston Manor school, Park View school, and Holte school. For an 11-to-16 school, the establishment of a sixth form would constitute a significant change in the character of the school, which would require the publication of proposals under sections 12 or 13 of the Education Act 1980, or section 96 or 97 of the Education Act 1993, as appropriate.

Maintained Schools

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is (a) the estimated number of pupils in maintained schools and (b) the amount allowed in the annual capital guidelines in respect of each such pupil for (i) 1994–95, (ii) 1995–96 and (iii) 1996–97, for (1) Somerset, (2) Shropshire, (3) Devon, (4) Dorset, (5) Buckinghamshire, (6) Kent, (7) Hampshire, (8) Norfolk and (9) Oxfordshire. [23580]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is set out in tables 1 and 2 in respect of 1994–95 and 1995–96, with the pupil numbers dating from the preceding January.

Since annual capital guidelines—ACGs—are mostly for capital work at county and voluntary controlled schools, the amount allowed per pupil is based on pupils at such schools in the local education authorities concerned, but the ACGs will have been used for specific work at particular schools, not for all schools in the LEAs. Total pupils at all maintained schools are listed separately. Estimates of numbers in maintained schools at January 1996 are not yet available on an individual LEA basis.

Post-16 Education (Birmingham)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement about surplus post-16 years places in educational establishments in Birmingham. [23521]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department does not routinely collect information in this form.

Higher Education

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the amount of funding per student attending institutes of higher education in Yorkshire and Humberside; and what was the amount in each year since 1979. [23833]

Mr. Forth: The information is not readily available centrally—but could be requested from the relevant institutions.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what assessment she has made of the impact on institutes of higher education in Yorkshire and Humberside of the reduction in the formula capital grant; [23835]

(2) what assessment she has made of the impact on the work of institutes of higher education in Yorkshire and Humberside with industry and commerce of the implementation of the recent budget cut. [24074]

(3) what proposals she has to provide interim funding to higher education to cover shortfalls in funding in the current year; [23837]

(4) what assessment she has made of the economic impact to the recent reductions in budgets for institutes of higher education; [23836]

(5) what assessment she has made of the impact on the economy in Yorkshire and Humberside of the reductions in budgets to higher education institutes in Yorkshire and Humberside. [23834]

Mr. Forth: The November 1995 budget settlement confirmed the 1994 plans for higher education recurrent expenditure. Planned capital expenditure was reduced in line with capital provision in most other public expenditure programmes, reflecting the policy that capital should, wherever possible, be financed through private finance schemes.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if changes to the current system of discretionary student grants are included in the review of higher education funding. [23770]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friends have yet to finalise, in the light of comments received during consultations, the terms of reference for the national committee of inquiry into higher education, but those terms will cover student support and are likely to be wide ranging. It will be for the committee itself to decide on which specific issues to focus.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received concerning the recent reductions in funding of higher education; and how many of these were from the Yorkshire and Humberside areas. [23814]

Mr. Forth: Education and Employment Ministers have received approaching 300 representations from higher education bodies and other interested parties concerning the recent reductions in funding of higher education. Around 4 per cent. were from the Yorkshire and Humberside areas.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the proportion of 18-year-olds currently entering higher education in the Yorkshire and Humberside area; and what was the proportion in each year since 1986. [23832]

Mr. Forth: We are unable to calculate the age participation index—API—for higher education on a regional basis as the data are not readily available. Comparable Great Britain figures are shown in the following table for the years concerned.

Academic year	API (percentage)
1986–87	14.08
1987–88	14.50
1988–89	15.10
1989–90	17.10
1990–91	19.30
1991–92	23.30
1992–93	27.50
1993–94	29.70
1994–95	31.00
1995–96	30–32.00

Figures show the number of young (aged under 21 years) home domiciled initial entrants to higher education in Great Britain expressed as a percentage of the averaged 18 to 19-year-old population. Initial entrants are those entering a full-time course of higher education for the first time.

We do not yet have comprehensive figures on the number of full-time undergraduate students in Great Britain in the current academic year. Our best estimate is within a range based on the November 1995 Budget projection which took account of latest data available from the universities and colleges admissions services and from local education authorities.

Expenditure

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list, for the most recent years for which information is available, and for each local education authority, the expenditure per pupil, full-time equivalent, in education on (a) the total education budget, (b) the general schools budget, (c) the potential school budget, (d) the aggregate schools budget, (e) the part of the budget allocated through age-weighted pupil units and (f), (b), (c), (d) and (e) each as a percentage of (a). [24141]

Mr. Robin Squire: I will write to the hon. Member with the available information when this has been collated.

EDS Computer System

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the terms of contract the Student Loans Company has with the EDS software computer system; and if she will make a statement. [24357]

Mr. Forth: The Student Loans Company's facilities management contract with EDS ended on 15 May 1995. Services are now provided by SHL Systemhouse Europe.

Dance Training

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures she is taking to increase opportunities for young people to have access to vocational training in dance. [23460]

Mr. Paice: Oversight for the co-ordination of training in the performing arts and entertainment industry, including dance, is the responsibility of the Arts and Entertainment Training Council, the recognised industry training organisation. The AETC is currently developing standards and national vocational qualifications in all sectors of the industry, including dance. The AETC has developed a modern apprenticeship framework for the industry to widen vocational education and training opportunities for young people.

General national vocational qualifications at foundation, intermediate and advanced levels in the performing arts and entertainment are now available to be piloted at various centres from September 1996.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of her Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if she will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23652]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Correction Fluid

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance she has issued concerning the use of paper correction fluid in schools. [24115]

Mr. Paice: The Department has drawn the attention of all schools to the Health and Safety Commissions's Education Services Advisory Committee's guidance, issued in 1994, entitled "Managing Health and Safety in Schools". ESAC has also produced specific guidance for schools on the safe use of substances hazardous to health. Education employers are required to assess the risks to health, of both employees and pupils, arising from the use of such substances and to have in place appropriate precautions to control those risks. This includes the use of liquid paper correction fluid where it contains substances hazardous to health. Normal use of correction fluid in schools should not, however, give rise to significant risks to health and safety.

The Department has also given advice in circular 4/95—"Drug prevention and schools"—on substances which are open to misuse. These include volatile substances or solvents such as correction fluid. The Department's digest of drug education resources for schools, issued last May, refers to materials which give advice about solvents. Solvents are also specifically mentioned in the references to drug education included in the national curriculum science order at key stages 3 and 4.The School Curriculum Assessment Authority—SCAA—offered guidance on related curricular matters in "Drug Education: Curriculum Guidance for Schools", also issued in May.

Life Long Learning

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what resources her Department has allocated to promoting the European Year of Life Long Learning; and what other measures have been taken by her Department to promote the success of this year. [24180]

Mr. Paice: The Department has set up a United Kingdom co-ordination unit under the terms of the decision establishing the year. The unit has facilitated bids for European funding and awards have been made to 90 UK organisations for a variety of projects at national, regional and local level.

I launched the year in the UK at Edinburgh in February, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for education at the Scottish Office.

Student Loans

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment for what reasons student loans will not be available to applicants over 50 years of age; and if she will make a statement. [24181]

Mr. Forth: The loans scheme provides students with additional resources from the taxpayer in anticipation of their repaying that loan out of future earnings. Students over 50 generally do not have the same expectations of future earnings as younger people and they are more likely to have access to other sources of finance.

Teachers' Superannuation Scheme

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to make a decision about the proposed contractorisation of the Teachers' Pensions Agency. [24365]

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave yesterday to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), Official Report, column 31.

Remploy

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what targets Remploy has been set in its 1996–97 annual performance agreement. [24588]

Mr. Paice: My noble Friend the Minister of State has written to the chairman of Remploy approving the 1996–97 annual performance agreement between the Department and the company. This agreement covers the year from 1 April 1996. It has been negotiated by the chief executive of the Employment Service, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. The targets are:

- the average number of disabled people employed by Remploy Ltd. will be at least 9,400;
- the average number of disabled people employed under the interwork scheme will be at least 2,400;
- at least 175 disabled employees will move from Remploy factories to interwork having been employed there for at least one year, or from interwork or factories to open employment;
- Remploy Ltd. will keep within a total unit cost target (operating deficit per disabled worker) of £10,170;
- the unit cost of interwork should be no more than £4,540;
- Remploy Ltd. will keep within an operating deficit of £99 million (including reorganisation costs).

The text of the annual performance agreement is being placed in the Library.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Torture Equipment Exports

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what reports he has received alleging that the ban on the sale of torture equipment to certain countries has not been complied with; and if he will make a statement. [20354]

Mr. Oppenheim: I have not received any such reports. However, the Government deeply deprecate the export of any equipment knowingly to be used as an instrument of torture and would never themselves knowingly support such activity. In cases where export licences were required, no such licence would be granted if there was reason to believe that the goods would be misused for such purposes.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the allegations in the Channel 4 "Dispatches" programme of Government knowledge or approval of the export of torture equipment. [20351]

Mr. Oppenheim: I assume the programme to which the hon. Member refers is "The Torture Trail", originally screened on 11 January 1995. The Government deeply deprecate the export of any equipment knowingly to be used as an instrument of torture and would never themselves knowingly support such activity. In cases where export licences were required, no such licence would be granted if there was reason to believe that the goods would be misused for such purposes.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the offshore sale of arms and instruments of torture by British companies; what plans he has to prevent such sales; and if he will make a statement. [22293]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 22 March 1996]: I am not specifically aware of any such sales. However, in respect of goods licensable under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989 the Government are considering whether to cover this issue in forthcoming public consultation on a range of export control matters following Sir Richard Scott's recent report.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information his Department has evaluated in respect of the sale of electro-shock weapons or equipment from the United Kingdom. [22323]

Mr. Oppenheim: I am aware of allegations made in a recent television programme. The export of electro-shock weapons from the United Kingdom is controlled under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989 and there have been no allegations of any breaches of export controls. I am not specifically aware of any such sales organised off-shore by UK resident companies. However, in respect of goods licensable under the Export of Goods (Control) Order the Government are considering whether to cover this issue in forthcoming public consultation on a range of export control matters following Sir Richard Scott's recent report.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions he has acted to prevent the export of electro-shock batons in the last three years. [21542]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 18 March 1996]: With the exception of the one transhipment licence referred to by my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology in his letter of 3 August 1995 to the hon. Member in response to her question tabled on 17 July 1995, my Department has not received any applications for the export of electro-shock batons during the period in question.

Aerospace Technology

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action has been taken to establish new university-linked applied research schemes for dual-use and civil aerospace technology requirements since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23693]

Mr. Eggar: A joint working forum on civil and defence collaboration in science and technology—the "civil/defence forum"—was established in June 1995, involving officials from the Ministry of Defence, the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Office of Science and Technology to improve the co-ordination of dual-use civil and defence science and technology. The forum has been investigating mechanisms and potential areas for collaboration—the latter being based on technology foresight outputs—involving participants from academia, industry and defence.

Ms Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action has been taken to develop a national strategy for aerospace technology since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23689]

Mr. Eggar: My Department is continuing its partnership with industry to maintain a common approach to the recommendations of the defence and aerospace panel of technology foresight. The panel is continuing its work with the full support of my Department. As part of this process, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade met the Society of British Aerospace Companies and they subsequently met me and the Government's chief scientific adviser. Also, under a joint DTI-SBAC initiative, co-ordinators have been consulting DTI and industry to determine civil aircraft research and demonstration programme priorities in discrete technology areas, addressing the long-term competitive needs of the industry.

Ms Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action has been taken to support collaboration between the Civil Aviation Authority, industry and academics to maximise market opportunities arising for European programmes. [23686]

Mr. Eggar: There are a number of programmes supporting work in air traffic management and aviation safety that are of interest to the Civil Aviation Authority. These are run by European bodies such as the European Civil Aviation Conference, the European Commission and Eurocontrol. They are concerned with longer-term research and as such are some distance away from market exploitation. My Department maintains a dialogue with the CAA and its parent Department, the Department of Transport, on research and other related issues.

Ms Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what increase in funding has been made for industrial applied research in civil aerospace through the civil aircraft research and demonstration scheme since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23694]

Mr. Eggar: The civil aircraft research and demonstration programme supports research in aeronautics rather than space. There has been no increase in funding for industrial applied research in civil aeronautics through CARAD since the 1995 report for the technology foresight panel—published in April 1995.

Ms Squire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what increase in funding has been made for technology demonstrator programmes for civil aerospace since the 1995 report from the technology foresight panel. [23696]

Mr. Eggar: There has been no increase in funding for civil technology demonstrator programmes since the 1995 report for the technology foresight panel—published in April 1995.

Deregulation (Gun Barrel Proving) Order 1996

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the estimated total cost of preparing the Deregulation (Gun Barrel Proving) Order 1996 for submission to the Deregulation Committee, broken down by (a) drafting, (b) printing and (c) costs incurred during consultation. [23639]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The cost of preparing the Deregulation (Gun Barrel Proving) Order is estimated at about £9,500, excluding printing cost, which are not available. All but about £130 of this is estimated staff costs. It has not been possible to apportion these between the consultation, drafting and printing stages.

Vehicle Road Licence Discs

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was (a) the total number of post offices and sub-post offices in Wales and (b) the number of post offices and sub-post offices currently selling vehicle road licence discs, breaking down the figures for each Welsh county and showing (b) as a proportion of (a). [22702]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 1 April 1996]: I understand from the Post Office that the total number of post offices and of post offices issuing motor vehicle licences in Wales by county are as follows:

(a) Post Offices in Wales by county

	Crown offices	Modified sub offices	Sub office	Community offices
Gwynedd	5	12	199	50
Clwyd	5	7	179	26
Dyfed	5	10	257	63
West Glamorgan	4	2	161	0
South Glamorgan	4	5	105	1
Gwent	3	8	198	8
Powys	0	7	94	30
Mid Glamorgan	4	8	180	1
Total	30	59	1,373	179

(b) Post Office issuing MVLs in Wales by county

	Crown offices	Modified sub offices	Sub office
Gwynedd	5	12	32
Clwyd	5	7	31
Dyfed	5	10	18
West Glamorgan	4	2	18
South Glamorgan	4	5	19
Gwent	3	8	34
Powys	0	7	8
Mid Glamorgan	4	8	29
Total	30	59	189
(b) as per cent of (a)	100	100	14

Mr. Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to require each post office and sub-post office to sell vehicle road licence discs. [22606]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 1 April 1996]: Decisions on the overall number of post offices issuing motor vehicle licences are a matter for the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23656]

Mr. Lang: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Cuba

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions Her Majesty's Government have had with the (a) Canadian and (b) Mexican Governments regarding action in relation to the United States Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act. [24117]

Mr. Nelson: We have been in regular contact with the Canadian and Mexican Governments concerning the US legislation.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions Her Majesty's Government have held with the EU in respect of World Trade Organisation action against the United States Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act. [24120]

Mr. Nelson: Her Majesty's Government have been in close contact with our EU partners and the European Commission about the implications of the US legislation.

The question of its compatibility with the United States' international obligations, including those of the WTO, is one aspect which is being considered.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the United States Administration regarding extra-territorial aspects of the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act. [24121]

Mr. Nelson: The UK has already made a number of representations to the US Administration expressing its concern at the extra-territorial aspects of the US legislation. We shall be making further representations shortly.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action Her Majesty's Government will take to protect United Kingdom companies and individuals that are the subject of litigation in United States courts, with particular reference to the Cuban Liberty and Democratic Solidarity Act. [24116]

Mr. Nelson: The provisions in the US legislation which give US nationals a right of action against non-US persons allegedly trafficking in expropriated property do not enter into force until 1 August and may be suspended by the President on a six-monthly basis. We shall be pressing the US Administration to make use of this provision for suspension.

Environmental Technology Industries

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the level of financial support from the Government for environmental industries for the early research and development phase of product development in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993, (e) 1994 and (f) 1995. [24111]

Mr. Page: Support for research and development on technologies with a specific environmental function, under the environmental technology innovation scheme, Eureka- Euroenviron and the environmental technology best practice programmes was as follows:

Year	£ million
1990–91	0.1
1991–92	0.96
1992–93	2.91
1993–94	2.95
1994–95	2.53
1995–96 (estimate)	1.72
Total	11.17

The above support includes programmes operated by both the Department of Trade and Industry and the Department of the Environment.

Some of the research and development supported under general DTI programmes, such as the small firms merit award for research and technology, support for products under research, Link and other Eureka activities and through the Office for Science and Technology's funding of research councils, will be relevant to the environmental technology industries.

Support for the new and renewable energy technologies and clean coal technologies was as follows:

£ million

Year	New and renewables	Clean coal
1990–91	20.8	13.0
1991–92	24.8	4.6
1992–93	25.5	4.0
1993–94	25.2	7.8
1994–95	19.1	7.9
1995–96 (estimate)	17.8	7.0
Total	133.2	44.3

Defence Diversification

Mr. Denham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further plans he has to promote defence diversification. [22313]

Mr. Eggar: Diversification projects can potentially benefit from a number of regional, export and technology initiatives. The Konver initiative specifically addresses the economic development of defence-dependent areas. Following the inaugural meeting of the British Konver II programme on 22 February, applications for grant have been invited for this programme, which will be worth some £200 million over the next four years.

Technology Foresight

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to respond to the first report of the House of Commons Science and Technology Committee of Session 1995–96 on technology foresight, HC 49. [24763]

Mr. Lang: I am publishing the Government response to the Select Committee's report today. I am pleased to say that the Government predominantly accept the recommendations made by the Committee. We are grateful for the Committee's continuing support for technology foresight.

AEA Technology plc

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the formation of AEA Technology plc and the objectives he has set for the chairman. [24762]

Mr. Page: The property, rights and liabilities of that part of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority known as AEA Technology were transferred to a separate company, AEA Technology plc, on 31 March. Corporate status gives AEA Technology a basis on which to build on the substantial progress it has made as a business over the last couple of years.

I have today written to Sir Anthony Cleaver, the chairman of AEA Technology plc, setting out his objectives for the period that the company is in public ownership. The text of my letter is as follows:

> I am writing to set out your objectives as Chairman of AEA Technology plc whilst the company is in public ownership.
> As you know, the Government intends to offer AEAT for sale as a single integrated business in the course of this year. No decisions have yet been taken about the method of sale.

Whatever form it takes, I expect you and your Board to do everything possible to ensure that the sale is carried through successfully and secures maximum value for the taxpayer.

The success of the sale depends critically on the performance of the business over the next few months. Since AEA Technology was set up in April 1994, substantial progress has been made in improving profitability, reducing costs and increasing responsiveness to customer concerns and requirements. Major changes have also been made to management systems, particularly financial systems, in order to improve the quality and timeliness of management information. The progress which has been made is a tribute to the efforts of both mismanagement and staff but it needs to be sustained. I look to you to ensure that it is sustained. In particular, the company should continue:

(a) to promote the growth of its business with the UK private sector and in overseas markets.

(b) to bear down on overheads, increase operational efficiency and ensure that the financial and other information available to management fully meets their perceived needs.

(c) to improve the quality of service available to customers; and

(d) progressively to increase profitability and its rate of return on capital employed.

The company has gone through a period of extensive restructuring over the last two years. When complete, this will result in a more coherent, lower cost business better focused on the needs and requirements of its customers. You should, however, continue to keep the structure of the company under review and be ready to make any further organisational or management changes which might be necessary to maintain or increase its competitiveness and achieve commercial success.

More generally, AEA Technology can help improve UK competitiveness through collaboration with other UK companies in home and overseas markets. I look to you to ensure that opportunities for mutually beneficial collaboration are exploited wherever possible. You should also ensure that AEA Technology's dealings with UKAEA are carried out on an appropriate commercial basis.

AEA Technology is predominantly a people business. You should therefore ensure that you have effective arrangements in place to incentivise management and staff and to encourage commitment to, and personal identification with, the commercial objectives of the company.

Within the framework of the company's Business Plan, you should ensure that AEAT explores all options for exploiting its technology, including collaboration with other organisations where this is commercially justified.

You should ensure that AEAT continues to have arrangements which secure at all times the highest practicable standards of safety in all its activities and that all relevant regulatory and security requirements are met.

You should ensure that the company complies fully with the requirements of the Cadbury code on corporate governance and conducts its affairs in a manner consistent with the principles of financial propriety and regularity applicable to a public sector body.

Where appropriate, specific targets in support of those aims and objectives will be set from time to time in consultation with you. I expect you to provide regular reports on progress against these targets and, more generally, on the company's performance and preparations for privatisation.

Laboratory of the Government Chemist

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the sale of the Laboratory of the Government Chemist. [24761]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government completed on 31 March the sale of the Laboratory of the Government Chemist to LGC (Holdings) Ltd., a company formed by a consortium lead by the chief executive, Dr. Richard Worswick, and comprising LGC management and staff, the Royal Society of Chemistry and 3i Group plc.

The intention to privatise LGC was announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) on 14 April 1994.

On 10 November 1995, the consortium was selected as the preferred bidder after extensive evaluation against the Department's objectives for the sale and a wide range of quantitative, technical and financial criteria which demonstrated that their bid represented the best value-for-money option for the Department.

The consideration will be a payment of £360,000 to the Department, to be adjusted subsequently in the light of the level of net current assets at completion. At the same time, the Department will be making a payment to the purchaser of £1.96 million to relieve the Department of the liability for (a) site separation work to allow LGC to untie from the national physical laboratory on the Department's Teddington site, and (b) building dilapidation works; the purchaser will take on the entire responsibility for the successful completion of these projects.

In the event that the purchaser is not awarded a contract which was assumed in the bid, there will be (a) payment to the purchaser of £300,000 to forestall consequential redundancies and to enable it to develop alternative business streams, and (b) an indemnity for the cost of any such redundancies up to a maximum sum of £500,000.

Dr. Worswick has been reappointed as the Government Chemist. Virtually all the staff in the undertaking will transfer to the purchaser.

This represents a highly satisfactory outcome for Government and for LGC. The unique combination of the existing management and staff, the RSC, and 3i will allow LGC to forge a new future as a successful commercial enterprise, building on its existing strengths in analytical chemistry. At the same time, LGC will continue to meet the Department's needs as the centre of excellence in chemical metrology. The involvement of the RSC will help to maintain LGC's independence and impartiality which is of particular importance for the discharge of the Government Chemist's statutory responsibilities. I particularly welcome the confidence shown in the laboratory by the staff, many of whom will be investing in the new company to be operated by the purchasers.

Crude Oil (Storage)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the minimum tonnage of crude oil as collated by Customs and Excise required to be stored at each of the United Kingdom oil refineries. [24263]

Mr. Page: There is no requirement for crude oil to be stored specifically at UK oil refineries.

Oil refining companies are currently directed to hold stocks of petroleum products amounting to 75 days of their deliveries into final consumption in the previous year in three product categories specified by EC directive 68/414/EEC. Directions do not specify the location in which stocks are to be held.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the tonnage of crude oil as collated by Customs and Excise stored at each of the United Kingdom oil refineries on or about 15 January, 15 February 1996 and 15 December 1995. [24262]

Mr. Page: The information requested is not readily available in the time given and is treated as commercially confidential.

The information provided by the oil industry does not separate oil held at refineries as opposed to other facilities. The collection of the information required would impose disproportionate costs.

Patent Office

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the criteria on which a decision to contract out the work of the central inquiry unit of the Patent Office will be based; and if he will make a statement. [24159]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The general criterion is increased value for money through improvements in efficiency and quality of service. More specific criteria will be drawn up for inclusion in any invitation to tender.

The overall objective is to ensure the Patent Office is in a position to withstand competitive pressures.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Patent Office management board is authorised to oppose a study into the contracting out of the work of Departments with the Patent Office; and if he will make a statement. [24163]

Mr. Taylor: The final responsibility for decisions on contractorisation rests with the Minister concerned. Such decisions take into account advice from the chief executive and his board.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of the marketing budget of the Patent Office is accounted for by the central inquiry unit; and if he will make a statement. [24158]

Mr. Taylor: About 30 per cent. of the Patent Office budget for publicity and marketing is allocated to the central inquiry unit.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Coopers and Lybrand report on the Patent Office information services department will be published; what has been the cost of the report; and if he will make a statement. [24162]

Mr. Taylor: The report contains commercially confidential material and will not be published. The cost of the review was £49,300.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will (a) name the bidders for the London office of the Patent Office, (b) announce the date on which the contracts will be awarded and (c) list the dates on which consultation has taken place with the Patent Office unions; and if he will make a statement. [24166]

Mr. Taylor: The decision on the successful bidder for the management of the London front office is expected in late April and will be announced shortly thereafter. Under the 1989 arrangements for consultation on contractorisation projects, the Patent Office trade unions were consulted on the invitation to tender in January 1996. The topic was also raised with me by the trade unions during my visit to the Patent Office on 27 March.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will outline the time scale for any study into contracting out the work of the central inquiry unit of the Patent Office; who is responsible for the study; when the contracts expire; and if he will make a statement. [24164]

Mr. Taylor: A preliminary study of the feasibility of contracting out the central inquiry unit is being carried out in-house. It is expected to be ready in late June.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the members of the Patent Office steering board; and if he will make a statement. [24157]

Mr. Taylor: The current members of the Patent Office steering board are:

Mr. B. G. Hilton (Chairman)
Mr. P. R. S. Hartnack
Mr. D. R. McMurtry
Mr. J. R. Pryer
Mr. D. R. Fairbairn
Mr. B. A. Wright
Mr. T. J. Cassidy
Mr. M. O'Shea.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many information technology consultants are employed at the Patent Office information technology services department; who employs them; and he will make a statement. [24161]

Mr. Taylor: Contract staff recruited to provide specialist skills not available in-house to the Patent Office currently number 36. They are supplied by a number of companies selected through an open competition. These suppliers are:

Abraxas Computer Services Ltd.
Almondhall Computer Staff
Computer People
Cray Systems Ltd.
DPP International Ltd.
DP Support Services
Eurolink Group
Footprint Computer Recruitment
Lorien Computer Recruitment Ltd.
The Modus Group
Task Force IT ServiceLine
Visionbase Systems Ltd.
World Systems plc.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what official notification his Department has made of a study into the contracting out of the work of the central inquiry unit of the Patent Office; and if he will make a statement. [24165]

Mr. Taylor: The staff of the central inquiry unit and trade union representatives have been told of the decision to carry out a feasibility study of contractorisation by the Patent Office management. Members of Parliament with an interest have been informed through parliamentary questions or ministerial correspondence.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the last civil servant was recruited to work at the Patent Office information technology services department; and if he will make a statement. [24265]

Mr. Taylor: Two civil servants were recruited into the Patent Office information technology services department in January 1995.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list (a) the number and (b) names of the private consultants currently employed in the Patent Office. [24371]

Mr. Taylor: Only Coopers and Lybrand is currently employed by the Patent Office. Marketing Improvements and Logica Ltd. have recently been employed but have now submitted their final reports which are under active consideration.

Meat Processing and Transport Industry

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people were employed in each sector of the meat processing and meat transport industry for each county of England as of 1 March. [24100]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Information at county level on employees in the "production, processing and preserving of meat and meat products"—SIC 1992 group 151—is available from the census of employment 1993 and can be accessed through the NOMIS database by the House of Commons Library. Employees in the meat transport industry are found across SIC 1992 divisions 60–63—land, sea, and air transport; supporting transport activities. However, it is not possible to identify these employees specifically.

SCOTLAND

BSE

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cattle have been confirmed as being infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy in Scotland in each year from 1986 to 1995. [22934]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Number of confirmed cases
1986	0
1987	7
1988	54
1989	208
1990	486
1991	808
1992	1,850
1993	2,208
1994	1,326
1995	660
1996 (to 25 March 1996)	60

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he plans to publish the initial conclusions of the experiments on transgenic mice being administered bovine spongiform encephalopathy. [22936]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: This research programme is being undertaken by Professor John Collinge of the prion disease group of Imperial college school of medicine with funding from the Wellcome Foundation. I have no information on when the initial findings will be published. I would, however refer the hon. Member to an article by Dr. Collinge which was published in "Nature" magazine—vol 378—on 28 December 1995.

Funicular Railway, Cairngorm

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 344, if a funicular railway built by the Cairngorm Chairlift Company with money from Highlands and Islands Enterprise can be (a) operated by, and (b) transferred to, the Cairngorm Railway Company. [24131]

Mr. Kynoch: The extent to which a private asset whose creation was assisted from public funds could be operated by or transferred to a company other than that to which the assistance was provided would depend upon the terms and conditions of that assistance. In the case of assistance provided by Highlands and Islands Enterprise, it is a standard condition that the onward transfer of assets in respect of which financial assistance has been provided may not take place without the consent of that organisation.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23630]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The Scottish Office policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. We take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive is currently being revised.

Royal Infirmary, Edinburgh

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the proposal to construct the new Royal infirmary in Edinburgh as a private finance initiative project will be open to public inspection before a decision is made to award any contract in respect of it; and if he will make a statement. [23910]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 April 1996]: At present, the PFI proposals for the new Royal infirmary in Edinburgh are being prepared by the shortlisted consortia which have been invited to tender. Once a preferred bidder is selected, the trust intends to place on public display, at the Royal infirmary, the plans and designs for the proposal. Extensive information about the project is already available and can be viewed at the infirmary by arrangement.

Bids from the consortia are expected in May. The trust will assess these bids in detail before announcing the selected proposal in July. The trust will then compare this bid against a publicly funded option and present the outcome of this in a full business case, which will be submitted for approval to Ministers and the Treasury. Final contract negotiations will then take place, if the private sector bid offers superior value for money. A contract award is scheduled for the end of this year.

Health Boards

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list his Department's contribution to local health boards to cover costs of changes in administration with particular reference to (a) signposting and (b) stationery. [23912]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton [holding answer 1 April 1996]: Funds were made available to health boards for them to distribute to NHS trusts to assist with their establishment. No information is held centrally on how these funds were used.

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the management costs as a percentage of total expenditure in respect of each local health board in Scotland separately identifying the NHS trusts within each. [23911]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The information for health boards is set out in the table. The percentages have been calculated using figures from the 1994–95 annual accounts. This is the latest year available. NHS trusts in Scotland did not separately identify management costs within the annual accounts for the financial year 1994–95.

Health boards	Per cent.
Argyll and Clyde	2.0
Ayrshire and Arran	1.5
Borders	2.5
Dumfries and Galloway	2.4
Fife	2.3
Forth Valley	2.1
Grampian	1.8
Greater Glasgow	2.0
Highland	2.4
Lanarkshire	1.5
Lothian	2.0
Orkney	3.9
Shetland	3.0
Tayside	1.3
Western Isles	3.0
Scotland average	1.9

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much expenditure has been incurred in payments to consultants engaged in connection with PFI projects within the health service in Scotland. [23909]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 April 1996]: Consultants are engaged to assist in PFI projects following a competitive tender run by the trust or health board. The resulting agreements are of a commercial nature and the value of each is not notified to the Scottish Office. It is estimated that 2 per cent. of the capital value of a scheme is incurred in fees on a PFI project. This compares favourably with the cost of a publicly-funded procurement, and is often less, chiefly due to the fact that detailed design work is done at the cost of the private rather than public sector.

Forestry Commission (Woodland Sales)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what is the number and size of Forestry Commission woodlands sold in total and for each year since 1981 in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland and the amount of income received in total and in each year since 1981 for the sales in each country; [23763]

(2) if he will list the number, size and location of Forestry Commission woodlands sold since 1981 for which access agreements have been concluded. [23764]

Mr. Kynoch: The subject of the questions relates to matters undertaken by Forest Enterprise. I have asked its chief executive, Mr. Neil McKerrow, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Neil A. H. McKerrow to Mr. Paddy Tipping, dated 2 April 1996:

You asked the Secretary of State for Scotland the following questions:—

(1) "What is the number and size of Forestry Commission woodlands sold in total and by each year since 1981 in (a) England, (b) Wales and (c) Scotland and the amount of income received in total and in each year since 1981 for the sales in each country".

(2) "if he will list the number, size and location of Forestry Commission woodlands sold since 1981 for which access agreements have been concluded".

As the questions you raised relate to matters that are undertaken by Forest Enterprise, the questions have been passed to me for reply.

In reply to the first question, lists of all Forestry Commission disposals for the years 1981–1995 are placed yearly in the Library of the House of Commons and contain the information on individual disposals you require. I enclose copies of these for your use.

A breakdown of income received by country is not held centrally. However, the total receipts from sales throughout Britain are as follows:

Year ended 31 March	Total receipts £ million
1981	4.5
1982	6.9
1983	14.6
1984	23.6
1985	22.1
1986	17.0
1987	14.7
1988	13.1
1989	12.4
1990	13.0
1991	12.0
1992	14.5

Year ended 31 March	Total receipts £ million
1993	9.9
1994	17.4
1995	12.1

Your second question relates to public access agreements pertaining to woodlands sold since 1981.

I attach a list showing details of all woodlands that have been sold with completed public access agreements. You asked for information from 1981 but the arrangements for public access agreements were only introduced in October 1991 and the list, therefore, only covers disposals since then.

Sales with completed public access agreements as at 31 December 1995

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23647]

Mr. Kynoch: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

General Medical Practitioners

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the whole-time equivalent number of NHS general medical practitioners working in each health board area in Scotland at the latest date for which figures are available. [24383]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The whole-time equivalent number of unrestricted principals in each health board area in Scotland at 1 October 1995 is as follows:

	Number
Scotland	3,385.8
Argyll and Clyde	294.8
Ayrshire and Arran	250.0
Borders	76.0
Dumfries and Galloway	114.0
Fife	214.8
Forth Valley	188.8
Grampian	330.8
Greater Glasgow	598.5
Highland	179.8
Lanarkshire	321.5
Lothian	494.3
Orkney	24.0
Shetland	17.0
Tayside	252.0
Western Isles	29.8

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the electorates of each of the wards in each of the new council areas in Scotland, at 16 February. [24477]

Mr. Kynoch: The information requested will shortly be placed in the Library.

Parliamentary Constituencies

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the electorates of each of the existing parliamentary constituencies in Scotland at 16 February. [24478]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not yet available centrally.

Registers of Scotland

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the targets he expects the Registers of Scotland executive agency to achieve in the three-year period 1996 to 1999. [24808]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have set the Registers of Scotland the following key targets for 1996–99:

- to reduce progressively the turnround time for sasine writs from 33 days at 31 March 1996 to 25 days by 31 March 1999;
- to reduce progressively the turnround time for dealings with whole on the land register from 55 days at 31 March 1996 to 25 days 31 March 1999;
- to reduce unit costs in real terms by 4 per cent. against the 1995—96 target for sasine writs and 16 per cent. against the 1995–96 target for dealings with whole by 31 March 1997;
- to continue the land register extension programme and achieve the transfer of the counties of Ayr and Dumfries to the land register on 1 April 1977 and Perth, Angus and Kinross on 1 April 1998;
- for the trading fund to achieve a return of 6 per cent. on net capital employed over a three year period;
- to complete the conversion of existing land register counties to a digitised map and computer-based text system by 1 April 1997;
- to complete a full assessment of developing electronic, on-line access to the agencies databases by autumn 1996 and of the potential for linkages with other property and land databases held in Scotland; and
- to maintain at least 97 per cent. of customers expressing satisfaction with the quality of work and helpfulness of staff for all parts of the business.

ENVIRONMENT

Wetland Areas

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations his Department has recently received from Friends of the Earth Cymru concerning wetland areas in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [23182]

Mr. Clappison: None. Friends of the Earth has sent a copy of its report, "A Review of UK Compliance with the Ramsar Convention on Wetlands of International Importance" to the Department's European wildlife division in Bristol.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy on the protection of wetland areas in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [23184]

Mr. Clappison: As a party to the Ramsar convention on wetlands of international importance, the UK is committed to protecting wetlands and promoting their wise use. UK wetlands are protected through a combination of site-based and policy-based mechanisms. These are described in detail in the UK national report to the sixth meeting of the conference of the parties to the Ramsar convention, and planning policy guidance note No. 9 on nature conservation, copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the wetland areas in (a) England and (b) Wales which have been damaged over the past five years; and if he will make a statement. [23181]

Mr. Clappison: Information on the UK's internationally important wetlands with recorded or predicted negative changes in ecological character is included in the UK national report to the sixth meeting of the conference of the parties to the Ramsar convention, a copy of which is in the Library.

Secondary Liquid Fuel

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) on what date Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution revised the standard assessment levels for heavy metals in secondary liquid fuels; [23247]

(2) if he will place in the Library the data and analysis which formed the basis of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution's decision to revise the standard assessment levels for heavy metals in secondary liquid fuel. [23245]

Mr. Clappison: I do not intend to place such data and analysis in the Library.

Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution has developed environmental assessment levels for use in environmental, economic and best practicable environmental option assessments which are carried out by operators of industrial processes controlled under integrated pollution control. There are no specific EALs for particular processes or fuels.

Draft EALs were included in the consultation document entitled "Environmental, Economic and BPEO Assessment Principles for Integrated Pollution Control" published by HMIP in April 1994.

In the light of comments received during the consultation exercise, HMIP reviewed the overall BPEO approach together with the methodology used to set EALs.

A revised approach to the derivation of EALs was agreed in January 1995 and amended values were published in volume III of a set of consultation documents in July 1995.

Following further consultation, the revised guidance is due to be published by HMSO in the near future.

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many (a) United Kingdom, (b) European and (c) international standards committees are chaired by employees of the Building Research Establishment; [23098]

(2) what has been the cost of the Building Research Establishment European standards section in each of the past five years; [23090]

(3) what has been the cost in each of the past five years of the representation of United Kingdom interests on (a) United Kingdom, (b) European and (c) international standards committees by Building Research Establishment employees; [23094]

(4) how many (a) United Kingdom, (b) European and (c) international standards committees employ staff from the Building Research Establishment as representatives of United Kingdom interests; and how many of these are leading the United Kingdom team on their committee. [23099]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Building Research Establishment participation on United Kingdom, European and international standards committees, including steering committees, technical committees and working groups, is as follows:

	Standards committees
	United Kingdom	European	International
Number of committees chaired by employees of the Building Research Establishment	33	22	5
Number of committees with employees from the Building Research Establishment as representatives of United Kingdom interests (excluding those chaired by BRE)	329	41	17
Number of BRE staff who are leading the United Kingdom team on European and international committees	—	7	4

The cost to the Department of the Environment of the Building Research Establishment European standards section for years prior to 1993–94 is not readily available. Since then, the cost to the DOE of the section—to support standards work—is: 1993–94 £244,000; 1995–96 £190,000 (budget). The cost in each of the past five years of the representation of United Kingdom interests on standards committees by Building Research Establishment employees is not separately identified as this is included within the research and application programme carried out for the DOE.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what has been the total building and fitting-out cost of the large building test facility at the Cardington site of the Building Research Establishment; [23100]

(2) what are the total estimated building and fitting-out costs of the Burn hall at the Building Research Establishment; [23102]

(3) what has been the total cost of building 16 at the Building Research Establishment. [23103]

Mr. Jones: The total investment in the large building test facility at the Cardington site to date is £1.68 million. The total estimated building and fitting-out costs of the Burn hall and the Garston site is £3.49 million. The total cost of the new environmental office and seminar block at the Garston site—replacing building 16—to date is £1.52 million, excluding demolition cost of the old building: the estimated total cost of the building to completion is £3.83 million.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost of research carried out for his Department by the Building Research Establishment in each of the past five years; and what is the budget for such research in (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98, (i) in total and (ii) as a percentage of his Department's total research expenditure. [23091]

Mr. Jones: Expenditure on research and technical advice from the Building Research Establishment for the DOE in each of the past five years was:

1990–91: £22.1 million[1]

1991–92: £26.2 million[1]

1992–93: £34.1 million

1993–94: £34.0 million

1994–95: £34.4 million

1995–96: £34.6 million (estimated).

As percentages of the Department's total research expenditure, the figures are:

34.2 per cent.

32.9 per cent.

40.0 per cent.

37.5 per cent.

37.4 per cent.

39.3 per cent. (estimated).

Firm estimates for future years are not available. They will depend on the outcome of the bidding and tendering process for the DOE's programme.

[1] Figures exclude expenditure by the energy efficiency office, which became part of the DOE in 1992–93.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of PA Consulting's report on the future of the Building Research Establishment; [23095]

(2) when he expects to publish Government proposals for the future of the Building Research Establishment; [23096]

(3) what assessment he has made of the advantages of developing the Building Research Establishment as a national construction centre. [23097]

Mr. Jones: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has considered carefully the report from PA Consulting on options for transferring the Building Research Establishment to the private sector. I have relayed to him the outcome of my meetings with representatives of the construction industry. He has taken into account also the views of the advisory group which oversaw the work of the consultants, of BRE management and of BRE staff who made their position known to the consultants, to his Department and to me. He has concluded that BRE should remain as a single entity because it offers a unique range of complementary skills and technologies and fragmentation would substantially increase costs to customers and reduce efficiency. He has also concluded that one of the two alternative recommendations proposed by PA Consulting sets out the right route towards BRE's future structure. It is his view that the best future for BRE would be as part of a national centre for construction, established by the construction industry to improve industry technology, innovation and competitiveness.

This gives the construction industry the opportunity to translate into reality its concept of a national centre for construction—NCC—which would encompass BRE and would take the form of a company limited by guarantee. This approach would channel directly BRE's expertise towards stimulating innovation and helping the industry improve its performance while maintaining the objectivity and independence of BRE advice. The Government are prepared to share in the funding of a study which the industry proposes to set in hand so as to put in place within six months a business plan for an NCC. My right hon. Friend would look to the industry to take account of the views of BRE management and staff and the university sector, such as that already initiated by University College London in developing this plan. He is clear, however, that delivery of a satisfactory business plan carrying industry commitment to ownership is essential within the six-month deadline if the proposal for an NCC encompassing BRE is to proceed.

My right hon. Friend wishes to ensure that the transfer of BRE to an NCC can be implemented swiftly at the end of the six-month planning period. He has therefore put in hand work within his Department on preparations which would lead rapidly at the end of the six-month period to the implementation of the NCC plan by February 1997. As a contingency, however, against the possibility that the industry is unable to prepare a satisfactory plan within the initial six months, the Department will also prepare for sale or contractorisation of BRE to be completed by February 1997. This would be achieved through competitive tender under arrangements to maintain the independence, objectivity and authority which BRE currently provides. If no satisfactory purchaser were to emerge, a competitive contract would be let for management of BRE.

My right hon. Friend has placed in the Library of the House a copy of the report from PA Consulting, though such commercially sensitive information as might be of use to a potential purchaser has been removed. He has also placed in the Library the report of the advisory group which oversaw the consultants' study.

Mr. Garel-Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the transfer of the Building Research Establishment to the private sector. [24784]

Mr. Gummer: I have considered carefully the report from PA Consulting on options for transferring the Building Research Establishment to the private sector. My hon. Friend the Minister of State has relayed to me the outcome of his meetings with representatives of the construction industry. I have taken into account also the views of the advisory group which oversaw the work of the consultants, of BRE management and of BRE staff who made their position known to the consultants, to my Department and to the Minister of State direct. I have concluded that BRE should remain as a single entity because it offers a unique range of complementary skills and technologies and fragmentation would substantially increase costs to customers and reduce efficiency. I have also concluded that one of the two alternative recommendations proposed by PA Consulting sets out the right route towards BRE's future structure.

It is my view that the best future for BRE would be as part of a national centre for construction—NCC—established by the construction industry to improve industry technology, innovation and competitiveness.

Homelessness

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by standard housing region the number of households accepted as homeless by each local authority in England in 1995. [23108]

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Cunningham) on 19 March 1996, Official Report, column 137.

Waste Incinerators

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many waste incinerators there are in the United Kingdom; and how many of them meet European Union standards. [23156]

Mr. Clappison: A figure for the total number of waste incinerators in the United Kingdom is not readily available. Depending upon the size of the incinerator and the type of waste being burnt, the operation of incinerators is regulated by HM inspectorate of pollution, HM industrial pollution inspectorate in Scotland, the Department of the Environment in Northern Ireland or local authorities.

The EU legislation relating to waste incineration contains implementation dates by which existing units have to meet new standards. In some cases, tighter emission standards have been agreed. The implementation dates for these various standards have not yet been reached.

Construction Research

Mr Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total expenditure of his Department in each of the past five years and what is the budget for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98 for research on construction-related matters commissioned from organisations other than the Building Research Establishment, (i) in total (ii) as a percentage of his Department's total research expenditure; and if he will list the organisations which have been commissioned to undertake such research. [23092]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Expenditure on research and technical advice on construction-related matters commissioned from organisations other than the Building Research Establishment in each of the past five years was:

1990–91: £2.3 million
1991–92: £2.8 million
1992–93: £3.0 million
1993–94: £3.4 million
1994–95: £4.8 million
1995–96: £6.6 million (estimate).

A percentage of the Department's total expenditure on research and technical advice the figures are:

13.6 per cent.
3.5 per cent.
3.5 per cent.
3.7 per cent.
4.7 per cent.
7.5 per cent.

Firm estimates for future years are not available. They will depend on the outcome for the bidding and tendering process for the DOE's programme.

River Thames

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Enviornment what (a) research and (b) consultancy has been commissioned by (i) his Department, (ii) the Government office for London, (iii) the River Thames working group and (iv) the Thames advisory group in each of the past two years on matters relating to the River Thames; and if he will list the organisation as undertaking this work and its total cost. [23093]

Sir Paul Beresford: Research and consultancy work for the above groups on matters relating to the Thames is commissioned by the Government office for London. The following work has been commissioned in the past two years:

Research	Consultancy
1994–95
Research for River Thames Working group report	Wootton Jefferys
Thames strategy	Ove Arup Partnership
1995–96
Survey of upriver wharves on the tidal Thames	London Rivers Association
The business case for a passenger transport service on the River Thames	London First, KPMG, Steer Davies Gleave

The total cost to the Government of this work was £146,043.

The Government office for London has also contributed a total of £37,500 in 1995–96 towards urban design schemes for Thames-side sites in Southwark and Hounslow.

MOD Married Quarters Estate

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assumptions have been made about the potential contribution towards the Government's target for social lettings deriving from the Ministry of Defence married quarters estate. [23101]

Mr. Curry: None. It is for local housing authorities and housing associations to decide how to apply their resources to create social lettings, and to consider what use they may be able to make of surplus MOD housing that becomes available in their local area.

Housing Renewal (Leicester)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning housing renewal issues in Jermyn street, Leicester. [23667]

Mr. Clappison: No representations have been received about housing renewal issues from the residents of Jermyn street, Leicester.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will be prepared to meet representatives of the residents of Jermyn street, Leicester, and the hon. Member for Leicester, East to discuss housing renewal issues. [23668]

Mr. Clappison: It is primarily for the Leicester city council to respond to the concerns of residents of Jermyn street, Leicester, about these housing renewal issues. Accordingly, I suggest that the hon. Member contacts the city's director of housing to discuss a possible meeting.

Prisoners (Donated Organs and Brains)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if (a) donated organs and (b) brains removed from deceased prisoners are classed as waste under the European definition of waste and require the completion of waste transfer notes under the duty of care regulations. [23666]

Mr. Clappison: Whether a substitute or object is waste must be determined on the facts of the case and the interpretation of the law is a matter for the courts. In any particular case, the key question is whether the holder of a substance or object is discarding it or intends or is required to do so.

The Department has provided guidance on the interpretation of the definition of waste in annex 2 to DOE circular 11/94. On the basis of this guidance, the Department's view is that:

(a) human organs removed with the intention of their being used in a transplant operation or subjected to pathological examination have not been discarded and should not be regarded as waste; and

(b) if human organs are consigned for disposal in a process such as incineration because they have been discarded, they should be regarded as waste and would be subject to the duty of care as a controlled waste.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 28 February to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), Official Report, column 640, what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract with EDS; what contracts his agencies have with EDS; and if he will make a statement. [23717]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department's contract conditions enable it to terminate for breach of contract and sue the contractor for damages up to the limit permissible under general contract law.

The Department's agencies currently have no contracts with EDS.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the additional funds made available to local authorities to cover part of the extra expenditure they will incur as a result of the withdrawal of benefits from asylum seekers will count towards the capping limit for their expenditure; if the capping limit will apply (a) to funds local authorities have to contribute to looking after the needs of such asylum seekers and (b) to funds that will be reimbursed by the Government; and what will be the position of those authorities already at or near their capping limit. [24014]

Mr. Curry: The funds made available to local authorities will be by way of special grant; they will, therefore, have no impact on an authority's budget requirement and will fall outside capping. Any expenditure incurred by local authorities that is not covered by the grant will form part of their budget requirement and therefore will be subject to capping.

Joint Nature Conservation Committee

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the budget of the Joint Nature Conservation Committee will be for 1996–97 for (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Northern Ireland and (d) Scotland. [23825]

Mr. Clappison: The total allocation to the Joint Nature Conservation Committee for 1996–97 will be £4.465 million, made up as follows:

	£ million
(a) English Nature	2.515
(b) Countryside Council for Wales	0.700
(c) Northern Ireland	nil
(d) Scottish Natural Heritage	1.250

Mrs. Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many ecologists were employed by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee in (a) 1994–95 and (b) 1995–96; and what is the proposed number for 1996–97. [23826]

Mr. Clappison: The number of staff with relevant scientific qualifications employed by the JNCC's support unit for the years in question are:

Year	Permanent	Fixed-term appointments
1994–95	21	43
1995–96	24	36
1996–97	24	36

The figures for 1996–97 are for staff in post at 1 April. It is impossible to predict how this figure will alter during the year due to resignations or terminations of fixed-term appointment contracts.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent the salary of the chief executive of the London Docklands development corporation is performance related; what targets are used to measure his performance; and what account is taken of the income from the sale of land. [24106]

Sir Paul Beresford: The employment contract of the London Docklands development corporation's chief executive provides for an annual salary reviewable by the corporation's remunerations committee each year. Any increase proposed by the committee and supported by the corporation's board is subject to the approval of the Secretary of State with the consent of the Treasury. In addition, the chief executive is eligible for a non-consolidated performance-related payment of up to 10 per cent. each year at the discretion of the committee. The targets against which the chief executive's performance is measured are set by the committee and supported by the board. Income, from whatever source, is just one aspect of over 30 benchmarks designed to assess the effectiveness of the chief executive's overall operational and financial management for the purposes of performance-related pay.

Details of the chief executive's remunerations are contained in the corporation's published annual report and financial statements. Copies are placed in the House Libraries each year.

Organophosphates

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements his Department has made since 1992 to ensure that guidance note MS17 from the Health and Safety Executive is circulated to HSE field officers; and if he will make a statement. [23829]

Sir Paul Beresford: Copies of guidance note MS17 have been distributed to the area offices of the Health and Safety Executive for use by field inspectors and copies have been issued to the Employment Medical Advisory Service.

Dog Registration

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess the advantage of a national registration scheme for dogs. [22550]

Mr. Clappison: No. Our policy is to look at the specific issues related to dogs rather than impose a national registration scheme.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23655]

Sir Paul Bereford: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Council Tax

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the percentage increase for band D council tax for each local authority in England for the year 1996–97 relative to the year 1995–96 [24167]

Sir Paul Beresford: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, Housing and Urban Regeneration to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on 20 March 1996, Official Report, column 213.

Sefton Metropolitan Borough Council

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the review of the boundaries of Sefton metropolitan borough council to begin; and when the review will be completed. [24276]

Mr. Curry: I expect the Local Government Commission's review of Sefton to start later this year. The exact start date and the length of the review will be the subject of discussion with the commission, taking into account the other priority tasks which the commission has to undertake.

Menwith Hill Station

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action the Health and Safety Executive is taking to examine whether the people of Thornthwaite with Padfield parish, near Harrogate, are at risk of cancer from radomes located at Menwith Hill station; what co-operation there is between the HSE and North Yorkshire health authority in this matter; when inquiries are expected to be completed; to whom the report will be submitted; and if he will make a statement. [24367]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Health and Safety Executive was contacted by Harrogate borough council in February seeking views on possible risks associated with operations at Menwith Hill and the incidence of cancer in the area. Inquiries have been initiated, including contact with the North Yorkshire health authority and a response will be made to the borough council as soon as practicable.

Environmental Technology

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess which industries were the top five largest spenders on environmental technology in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993, (e) 1994 and (f) 1995. [24112]

Mr. Clappison: Expenditure by industry on environmental technology is not available by industrial sector. In 1990, the top five spending industries on pollution control, including capital and current spending, are listed below, together with estimated amounts spent. This information is taken from the results of a research report, "A Review of UK Environmental Expenditure", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office in 1993.

	Expenditure in 1990 £ million
Chemicals	580
Energy	550
Metals	450
Food processing	360
Engineering	330

No information is available for other years. A survey is being carried out by my Department on environmental spending by industry in 1994 and the result of this study will be published in May 1996.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue the new guidance on the conduct of compulsory competitive tendering; and if he will make a statement. [24586]

Sir Paul Beresford: Following consultation on the draft guidance, issued on 15 October 1995, we have today published a new departmental circular No. 5/96—Welsh Office No. 11/96—which provides guidance on the conduct of compulsory competitive tendering.

The Department received 222 responses to the consultation exercise. Of these, 162—or 73 per cent.—were from local authorities and related organisations. Thirty-two—or 15 per cent.—were received from contractors and trade associations. Police and fire authorities submitted 12—or 5 per cent.—of the responses and there were 16—or 7 per cent.—other responses. A further 15 responses were received by the Welsh Office and 45 by the Scottish Office, in both cases predominantly from local authorities. I have today placed a list of responses in the Library of the House. Copies of the responses are held in the Department's library.

Respondents broadly welcomed the move away from detailed emphasis on anti-competitive behaviour practices as set out in DOE circular 10/93—Welsh Office circular 40/93.

The new guidance identifies five principles for good tendering practice which local authorities are required to apply in subjecting work to compulsory competitive tendering. These stress the need for transparency and fairness as between potential contractors, and for key decisions to be informed by market conditions.

Local authorities are expected to provide clear account of the way in which key strategic decisions affecting the tendering process have been taken. The guidance also encourages authorities to provide reports to appropriate committees at key stages. These reports should explain the way in which strategic decisions are compatible with authorities' duty to avoid acting anti-competitively.

The circular makes clear that local authorities should consult, where appropriate, a range of suppliers and professional bodies before making decisions about the way in which work is selected and packaged for competition. Authorities will satisfy the provisions of the legislation only where they have taken steps to ensure that their tendering practices are consistent with securing a good market response.

The remaining principles encourage the adoption of output, rather than input, based specifications for services, require clear procedures for evaluating tenders to ensure that quality can be achieved and seek to ensure that the conduct of tendering between external contractors and in-house teams does not put any one of them at a disadvantage.

CCT has proved itself in delivering on price and quality. Average savings of 6.5 per cent. have been achieved and the same or higher standards have been adopted in the overwhelming majority of cases. I intend that the benefits of competition are made available to all local taxpayers.

The new guidance applies immediately to those services currently subject to competition. The Secretary of State will take into account the extent to which there has been a contravention of the guidance in determining whether authorities have acted anti-competitively.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will direct the Local Government Commission to carry out the electoral reviews referred to in his answer of 14 March, Official Report, column 695, to the hon. Member for Blackpool, North. [24590]

Mr. Curry: We are today directing the Local Government Commission to carry out electoral reviews of the eight areas where my right hon. Friend announced on 14 March that he was accepting the commission's recommendation that there should be unitary authorities. The eight areas are Blackburn, Blackpool, Halton, Peterborough—including minor boundary changes which the commission recommended and we have accepted—The Wrekin, Thurrock, Warrington, and the combined area of Gillingham and Rochester-upon-Medway.

We have asked the commission to submit its final reports by 3 December so that any new warding can be implemented in time for elections in May 1997.

Economic and Traffic Growth

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his press release of 28 February, if he will make a statement on the link between economic growth and traffic growth and its impact on the environment; and what assessment he has made of future trends. [23452]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

I refer to the answers that I gave to the hon. Member on 18 March, Official Report, column 44 and on 26 March, Official Report, column 552.

HEALTH

NHS Management (Termination Payments)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will provide up-to-date information on termination payments made by NHS trusts or health authorities to (a) chief executives and (b) general and senior managers including the number and amounts. [22170]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 22 March 1996]: The limited information available for 1995–96 shows that national health service trusts made four payments totalling £265,938 to chief executives and 92 payments totalling £1,930,588 to senior managers and that health authorities made 54 payments totalling £2,181,000 to general and senior managers.

NHS (Disciplinary Procedures)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will place in the Library the advice (a) his Department and (b) the NHS executive have received concerning disciplinary and legal aspects of the movement of staff between employers within the NHS; [22748]

(2) what plans he has to revise disciplinary procedures within the NHS as a result of the inquiry into the former Yorkshire regional health authority. [22736]

Mr. Malone: Disciplinary procedures for national health service staff employed on national terms and conditions are governed by the provisions of section 42 of the General Whitley Council handbook. This agreement provides the national framework within which each health authority determines it own procedures. NHS trusts are free to introduce their own arrangements.

Legal advice to Ministers is given in confidence. However, the general legal position is set out in paragraph 16 of the report by the Comptroller and Auditor General, HC280 Session 1995–96, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Conflicts of Interest

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued, and when, to NHS personnel on the declaration of conflicts of interest. [22742]

Mr. Malone: Guidance on standards of business conduct for NHS staff, including conflicts of interest, was issued in HSG(93)5 on 18 January 1993. On 9 August 1995 the chief executive of the NHS executive wrote to all NHS employers re-emphasising the need for NHS bodies to follow the NHS regulatory framework and observe the codes of conduct and accountability. Executive letter (96)12 issued on 16 February 1996 again reminded NHS employers of the importance of avoiding potential conflicts of interest. Copies of these documents are available in the Library.

NHS Authorities (Cars)

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health service bodies have operated car leasing schemes within the last five years that have been contrary to regulations; how many vehicles have been involved; and what has been the cost to the NHS. [22744]

Mr. Malone: Information about the operation of car leasing schemes of health bodies is not available centrally.

Severance Cases

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action has been taken on cases revealed by the departmental trawl of questionable severances in the health service. [22890]

Mr. Malone: The national health service executive, with the Treasury, has examined each case and action to recover moneys paid irregularly will be taken where it is feasible and cost-effective to do so.

General Practitioners (Computers)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was paid to (a) fundholding and (b) non-fundholding general practitioner practices for computer hardware and software in 1990–91 and in each year since then; and how many (i) fundholding and (ii) non-fundholding practices and general practitioners there were at the end of each of those years. [23299]

Mr. Malone: Reimbursement of the costs of computerisation in general practice are shown in the list. The amount reimbursed in 1990–91, when the scheme was introduced, includes claims for the financial years 1989–90 and 1990–92. The apportionment of these costs between fundholders and other GPs is not available centrally .

1990–91: £17 million

1991–92: £34 million

1992–93: £40 million

1993–94: £39 million

1994–95: £47 million.

The related figures for the number of fundholding and non-fundholding practices and general practitioners are as follows:

Year	Number of fundholding: Practices	GPs	Number of non-fundholding: Practices	GPs
1990–91	0	0	9,354	25,622
1991–92	306	1,715	8,822	23,749
1992–93	587	3,159	8,578	22,664
1993–94	1,249	6,140	7,869	19,976
1994–95	2,066	8,889	7,045	17,498

Alzheimer's Disease

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of Alzheimer's disease there have been in each year since 1990. [23405]

Mr. Bowis: Information on the number of cases of Alzheimer's disease is not available centrally.

Nurses and Midwives

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of staff on each spine point of the senior nurses and midwives pay spine; and what is the number of female staff on each spine point. [23730]

Mr. Malone: The information is shown in the table.

NHS Hospital and Community Health Services (HCHS) staff on senior nursing and midwifery pay scales (excluding agency) by spine point

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the establishments assessed by his Department to be leading centres of scientific excellence worldwide on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob-type diseases; what contact the Government have had with these centres in the past; and what use the Government propose to make of them in the future. [23393]

Mr. Horam: The Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee regularly reviews international research into spongiform encephalopathies. The director of the national Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease surveillance unit co-ordinates a European Community-funded project which brings together those working on this disease throughout Europe. We recognise the need to make full use of knowledge and expertise from a wide range of sources to extend our understanding of spongiform encephalopathies.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research he has evaluated on the nature of the infective agent in BSE and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease; and if he will make a statement. [24175]

Mr. Horam: The Government receive expert advice on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee—SEAC—the advice of which takes account of the results of all relevant research and surveillance. In February 1995, SEAC published "Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathies: A Summary of Present Knowledge and Research", copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Vaccinations

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the annual cost of universal vaccination of children for (a) measles-rubella, (b) bacille-Calmette-Guerin, (c) polio, (d) HIB, (e) diphtheria, (f) tetanus and (g) pertussis. [23400]

Mr. Horam: The cost to the Department of Health's vaccine supply budget of purchasing vaccines for the childhood immunisation programme for 1995–96 was £39 million, whilst £1.74 million was allocated to the Health Education Authority for promotion and publicity. In 1994–95, the last year for which figures are available, £53.6 million was paid out to general practitioners in immunisation target payments. Figures on the cost of health care workers administering vaccines and delivery of school based immunisation programmes such as bacille-Calmette-Guerin are not available centrally.

Bovine Serum

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of health risks involved in the use of bovine serum for the production of vaccines for (a) human and (b) animal use. [23518]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) on 26 March, Official Report, column 517. United Kingdom licensed vaccines comply fully with European guidelines produced by the European Committee on Proprietary Medicinal Products, "Minimising the risk of transmission of agents causing spongiform encephalopathies via medicinal products", copies of which are available in the Library. Currently, licensed vaccines do not contain any bovine material sourced from the United Kingdom. Matters regarding the production for vaccines for animals are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if serum of bovine origin is used in the production of vaccines for (a) human and (b) animal use. [23516]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker on 26 March, Official Report, column 517. The manufacture of vaccines can involve the use of foetal calf serum, but this is reduced to minute levels in the finished vaccine in line with the European Union-World Health Organisation guidelines. Foetal calf serum used in the manufacture of United Kingdom licensed vaccines is sourced from outside the UK and no bovine spongiform encephalopathy infectivity has been detected in foetal calf serum. Matters regarding the production of vaccines for animals are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what controls are in place in respect of the country of origin of serum of bovine origin used in the production of vaccines for (a) human and (b) animal use. [23517]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) on 26 March, Official Report, column 517. Manufacturers of vaccines are bound, by the conditions of their product licence, to comply with the European Committee on Proprietary Medicinal Products guidelines on "Minimising the risk of transmission of agents causing spongiform encephalopathies via medicinal products", copies of which are available in the Library. Matters regarding the production of vaccines for animals are the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many of the (a) possible and (b) proven CJD cases being examined relate to individuals who have had (i) contact and (ii) extensive contact with (1) dogs and (2) other domestic animals. [23529]

Mr. Horam: The national Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease surveillance unit has not so far identified contact with domestic animals as a possible risk factor for CJD.

Dementia

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the incidence of encephalitis, dementia and Alzheimer's disease in (a) under and (b) over 65-year-olds in each of the last 10 years. [23426]

Mr. Bowis: Information on the incidence of dementia and Alzheimer's disease is not available centrally. It is estimated that there are currently around 600,000 sufferers from dementia. Information on the number of notifications of all forms of encephalitis is not available centrally. Information on the number of notifications of acute encephalitis can be found in the annual reference volumes in communicable disease statistics—series MB2—copies of which are available in the Library.

Solid Services Review

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the terms of reference and objective of his review of social services; when he expects it to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [24135]

Mr. Bowis: The Department is working with local government interests to clarify trends in, and the factors generally influencing, social services costs, expenditure and service level and to improve the presentation of relevant data and their helpfulness to local social services authorities in their assessment of their own performance compared to national trends.

Tuberculosis and Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the incidence per head of population of (a) tuberculosis and (b) Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. [23772]

Mr. Horam: The provisional notification rate for tuberculosis—excluding chemoprophylaxis—for England and Wales for 1995 is 10.9 per 100,000 of the population (source, Office for National Statistics).

Data to the end of 1994 on Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease are published in the CJD surveillance unit's fourth annual report, copies of which are available in the Library. Provisional data so far suggest that the incidence in 1995 will be lower than in 1994.

Tuberculosis

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what change there has been in United Kingdom TB cases in the last 20 years. [23771]

Mr. Horam: The number of notifications of tuberculosis in the United Kingdom in 1975 was 12,620 and in 1995 was 6,249—provisional. This is a decrease of 50 per cent.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of tuberculosis occurred in the United Kingdom in each year between 1982 and 1993. [24358]

Mr. Horam: The number of notifications of tuberculosis in the United Kingdom is published in table 3.31 of the "Annual Abstract of Statistics". Information for the years 1982 to 1993 is set out in the 1994 and 1995 editions and is shown in the table:

Year	Number of notifications of tuberculosis in the UK[1]
1982	8,453
1983	7,795
1984	7,041
1985	6,647
1986	6,857
1987	5,745
1988	5,778
1989	6,059
1990	5,897
1991	6,078
1992	6,441
1993	6,564
1994	[2]6,229
1995	[2]6,249

[2] Provisional.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to introduce a system for identifying and screening population groups at high risk from tuberculosis; and if he will make a statement. [24350]

Mr. Horam: Those population groups at highest risk from tuberculosis include close contacts of patients with infectious tuberculosis, immigrants from countries with a high prevalence of tuberculosis and their families, and homeless people who sleep rough or who use open access hostels for the homeless. Screening of contacts of patients with infectious tuberculosis and of new immigrants from countries with a high prevalence of tuberculosis is already part of United Kingdom policy. The interdepartmental working group on tuberculosis has considered how prevention and control measures amongst high-risk groups, including the homeless, might be improved and its report on this aspect has recently been presented to Ministers. In addition, the Department of Health, working with the Home Department, is presently reviewing port of arrival arrangements for screening of new arrivals entering the United Kingdom from countries where the incidence of tuberculosis is high.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he intends to implement a programme for more rapid and effective testing of infective tuberculosis cases. [24248]

Mr. Horam: The current programme for identification of infectious tuberculosis cases uses the best available reliable and verified tests. Patients with tuberculosis are infectious to others when they have tubercule bacilli in their sputum. There are readily available and rapid laboratory procedures for the identification of such cases—sputum smear positive. Sputum smear negative cases are generally not infectious to others. Effective laboratory tests are available for identifying such cases; however, these take longer than sputum smear positive tests and more rapid tests are currently under development.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, for each year since 1985, the number of cases of multi-drug-resistant tuberculosis reported in the United Kingdom, and if they are primary or secondary resistance cases; and if he will make a statement. [24347]

Mr. Horam: Until recently, no system existed for the routine collection of national data of cases of multi-drug-resistant tuberculosis. Information on the general trends of such drug resistance has been maintained through the regular five-yearly surveys of tuberculosis notifications conducted by the public health laboratory service—PHLS. Information from the surveys are shown:

Year of survey	Number of newly notified cases of multi-drug-resistant tuberculosis (MDRTB)
1983	0 cases of MDR TB out of 981 TB patients surveyed
1988	1 case of MDR TB out of 840 TB patients surveyed
1993	2 cases of MDR TB out of 832 TB patients surveyed

A special review conducted by the PHLS, and published at the end of 1993, collated information on cases of multi-drug resistance in England and Wales between 1982 and 1991. The review used information from PHLS regional tuberculosis centres, from the PHLS mycobacterium reference unit and reports from hospital laboratories to the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre; figures from that study are shown in the table:

Year	Number of case of MDR TB
1985	9
1986	12
1987	7
1988	15
1989	11
1990	8
1991	14

The review highlighted the need for fuller monitoring of this problem and in 1994 a surveillance scheme—Mycobnet—was established by the PHLS communicable disease surveillance centre to monitor drug resistance in isolates of mycobacterium tuberculosis. Data from the first year of Mycobnet will be published shortly.

The most important measure in preventing the emergence of drug-resistant tuberculosis, including multi-drug-resistant tuberculosis, is to ensure that patients with tuberculosis are fully and correctly treated. The United Kingdom's excellent record in tuberculosis control has resulted in multi-drug-resistant tuberculosis in the UK remaining at low levels. To help ensure that this remains the case, as well as improving surveillance, an expert working group has been established under the auspices of the interdepartmental working group on tuberculosis to make specific recommendations for the prevention and control of drug-resistant tuberculosis.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the current control and surveillance measures on tuberculosis in the United Kingdom. [24351]

Mr. Horam: National guidelines for the prevention and control of tuberculosis in the United Kingdom have regularly been produced by the British Thoracic Society. They were last updated in 1994. The measures recommended in the guidelines have been reviewed by the interdepartmental working group on tuberculosis and its recommendations for best practice were recently presented to Ministers and will be published shortly.

The three main measures for controlling tuberculosis in the United Kingdom continue to be:

reducing the pool of infectious cases by promptly identifying and treating them; preventing progression to active disease in certain individuals by chemoprophylaxis; increasing immunity to tuberculosis through bacille-Calmette-Guerin immunisation of schoolchildren and certain high-risk groups.

National surveillance of tuberculosis through the routine notification system has in recent years been supplemented by more detailed five-yearly surveys of notifications to give a clearer picture of trends in different population groups. Recommendations from the interdepartmental working group on tuberculosis for the future surveillance of tuberculosis are currently the subject of a wide consultation exercise.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Helath what measures he intends to make adequate and appropriate treatment for tuberculosis more widely available; and if he will make a statement. [24349]

Mr. Horam: There are specialised chest clinics in every area supported by doctors experienced in the treatment of tuberculosis. It is the responsibility of health authorities to ensure that the provision of services is appropriate for the needs of their population.

Sellafield (Childhood Cancer)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his response to the fourth report of his committee on the medical aspects of radiation on childhood cancer in the vicinity of Sellafield; and what further work he has asked Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment to conduct on the problem. [23838]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mr. Merchant) on 27 March, Official Report, columns 663–65.

Cancer Treatment Centres

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence of diagnostical practice and treatment protocols will be expected from future designated centres for gynaecological oncology services. [24257]

Mr. Horam: That is a matter to be agreed between commissioning authority and provider unit. Service configuration guidance for use by health authorities in their discussions with provider units is being developed.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent guidance he has issued to health authorities and trusts about the creation of designated cancer treatment centres; and by what process he intends such centres to be so designated. [24202]

Mr. Horam: EL(96)15 issued on 15 March gives further guidance on implementing the policy set out in the document "A Policy Framework for Commissioning Cancer Services". Copies of EL(96)15 have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to designate centres for the treatment of gynaecological cancer; and if the existence and maintenance of agreed treatment protocols will form part of the tests for such designation. [24248]

Mr. Horam: The designation of cancer centres or units for the treatment of gynaecological cancer is a matter for the commissioning authority in discussion with provider units. The identification of local standards, to include treatment in line with agreed protocols and guidelines, should form part of contract negotiations.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to maintain a central record of oncology centres which have refused patients treatment on the grounds of lack of funds; and if he will make a statement. [24490]

Mr. Horam: It is for commissioning authorities in consultation with their provider units to determine the level and quality of services delivered to patients.

Prior Options Reviews

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if work has commenced on the prior options reviews of establishments which his Department sponsors. [24542]

Mr. Horam: As indicated by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in his announcement of the timetable for prior options reviews on 26 January 1996, Official Report, columns 421–23, the outcome of reviews of the National Radiological Protection Board, National Biological Standards Board and the public health laboratory service are due to be reported to Ministers by December 1996.

Work has recently commenced on the review of the National Radiological Protection Board. Views are being invited from any interested parties by means of an advertisement in "Government Opportunities" and by a direct approach to key organisations and individuals.

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answers of 11 December 1995, Official Report, column 521, and 19 December 1995, Official Report, columns 1149 and 1153, when the final manuscript from Professor Jick relating to third generation oral contraceptives was received by the Medicines Control Agency; and if it was included in the papers dispatched by courier at 16:00 on 11 October 1995. [22259]

Mr. Malone: The final manuscript of Professor Jick's study was received on 11 October 1995, after the papers were dispatched by courier. A near final version of the manuscript was included with the papers dispatched to committee members. There was no substantive change to the analysis in the final version.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1150, what new data, and from which studies, were presented to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products at its meeting on 17 and 18 October 1995. [22260]

Mr. Malone: The committee was presented with findings from the three new epidemiological studies relating to the cardiovascular risks of second and third generation oral contraceptives; these were the World Health Organisation's study, the transnational study and the general practice research database study conducted by Professor Jick.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1153, on which Minister's authority the "Dear Doctor" letter of 18 October 1995 relating to safety concerns regarding desogestrel and gestodene was issued. [22261]

Mr. Malone: The then Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville).

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer on 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1149, when the Licensing Authority received a manuscript relating to the transnational study, and if the Licensing Authority received a final manuscript for that study. [22262]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 December, Official Report, columns 1149 and 1153. The Licensing Authority has not received a manuscript relating to the transnational study from the investigators. The Licensing Authority has seen the report of the study published in the British Medical Journal on 13 January 1996.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if a referral of the matters relating to combined oral contraceptives containing desogestrel or gestodene was made to the Law Officers in terms of paragraph 22 (i) or 22 (ii)(c) of "Questions of Procedure for Ministers" of May 1992, prior to the referral to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products made on 11 October 1995. [23268]

Mr. Malone: It is not normal practice to disclose whether the advice of Law Officers has been sought in any particular case.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what meetings have been held between the Licensing Authority and the pharmaceutical companies holding product licences for combined oral contraceptives containing desogestrel or gestodene since 7 November 1995; [23269]

(2) pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, columns 344-45, with which companies and on what dates the discussions regarding supply took place. [23278]

Mr. Malone: Information about discussions held between the Licensing Authority and pharmaceutical companies is treated on confidence under the Medicines Act 1968.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, columns 232–44, relating to the letter of 11 October 1995 from the Medicines Control Agency, for what reasons it is not normal practice to publish such documentation. [23270]

Mr. Malone: The relevant documentation is considered to be a confidential communication between regulatory bodies. Such communications are not normally published because they may contain information which is sensitive for commercial reasons or relates to the formulation of policy.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1149, if regulatory action with respect to clinical trials of combined oral contraceptives has now been completed; and if he will make a statement. [23273]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 8 February, Official Report, column 386. In the case of clinical trials, the Licensing Authority would not normally make a public announcement.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 344, whether those who made arrangements on 11 October 1995 for the meeting of the Committee on Safety of Medicines on 13 October 1995 were made aware of the formal referral regarding safety concerns relating to desogestrel and gestodene to be considered by the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products on 17 to 18 October 1995. [23275]

Mr. Malone: Those making the arrangements were aware of the requests that this issue be placed on the agenda of the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products on 17 and 18 October 1995.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, columns 343–44 what was the legal basis for the referral of 11 October 1995 to the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products. [23277]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave him on 8 February, Official Report, columns 343–44, and the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1150.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what representations he has received about the safe use of Femodene ED; if he will list the names of those who have made such representations; and what action he has taken in response to such representations; [24297]

(2) what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the contraceptive pill Femodene ED; what medical side-effects, if any, the pill produces; what advice he has received from the manufacturer about the medical conditions where use of this pill would be inappropriate; and if he will make a statement. [24296]

Mr. Malone: Femodene ED is a combined oral contraceptive preparation containing ethinyloestradiol and gestodene. It is one of the seven brands of oral contraceptive which was subject of advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines in October 1995 in relation to the risk of venous thromboembolism. The advice of the CSM was based on research studies which indicated that oral contraceptives containing gestodene or desogestrel are associated with an increased risk of venous thromboembolism, compared with other oral contraceptives. The chairman of the CSM wrote to doctors and pharmacists on 18 October 1995 and a copy of his letter is available in the Library.

The contra-indications to use and side-effects of Femodene ED are documented in the product data sheet issued by the manufacturer and in the British National Formulary.

I refer the hon. Member to the statement to the House made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 23 October 1995, Official Report, column 701–11, and also, in respect of the matter of representations, to the replies I gave to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 8 February, Official Report, column 345.

Medicines Act 1968

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, columns 345–46, if he will list the occasions during 1995 on which (a) the Licensing Authority, (b) the Medicines Control Agency and (c) the Committee on Safety of Medicines have taken legal action with respect to matters relating to the Medicines Act 1968; and how many injunctions have been sought relating to material relating to the efficacy or safety of medicines. [23276]

Mr. Malone: The Medicines Control Agency, acting on behalf of the Licensing Authority, instigated legal proceedings in the criminal courts in respect of 35 cases in 1995 relating to enforcement of the Medicines Act 1968. No injunctions in respect of material relating to the efficacy or safety of medicines were sought during this period.

Adoption

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the principal legislative provisions he expects to change in his proposals for re-casting the law relating to adoption; and what means he expects to use. [24449]

Mr. Bowis: My Department published a consultative document "Adoption—A Service for Children" on 28 March; copies are available in the Library. The document includes a draft Adoption Bill and identifies some important changes to adoption law; changes will be effected through primary legislation, regulations and guidance.

Smoking

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of (a) the proportion of people from ethnic minorities who smoke and (b) the proportion of all smokers who are from ethnic minorities. [23265]

Mr. Horam: Estimates of cigarette smoking prevalence in 1992 among those aged 16 and over are shown in the table. Estimates of smoking prevalence among other ethnic minority populations are not available and it is not therefore possible to produce an estimate of the proportion of all smokers who are from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to alert members of ethnic minorities to the dangers of smoking and to encourage them to stop. [23266]

Mr. Horam: In addition to the provision of translations of anti-smoking literature, the Health Education Authority works closely with local health promotion agencies to develop resources best suited to the needs of particular communities.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of women who restart smoking after pregnancy; and what measures he is taking to encourage them not to. [23274]

Mr. Horam: No such estimate has been made.

The Health Education Authority is continuing its campaign aimed at pregnant women and, in conjunction with doctors, nurses and health visitors, a new educational leaflet will be available later in the spring. In addition, the national smoking education campaign is designed to motivate and assist those in socio-economic groups C2DE, in particular parents and pregnant women, to quit.

Mental Health Patients

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number and proportion of mental health patients in accommodation (a) directly provided or run by a local authority and (b) approved by but not directly provided or run by a local authority in (i) 1980, (ii) 1985, (iii) 1990 and (iv) 1995. [23267]

Mr. Bowis: The available information on the number of people in residential care homes is shown in the table. Information is not available centrally for 1980 and 1985 in this form.

Residents in residential care homes for people with mental illness[1]
England at 31 March Numbers and percentages

	1990	1995
Local authority homes[2]
Residents in homes for mentally ill people	4,885	4,070

Medicines Commission

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the answer of 8 February, Official Report, column 345 (1) on what basis Professor W. Butterfield was appointed as chairman of Medicines Commission for the period 1 January 1978 to 31 December 1981; [23271]

(2) on what basis Professor Rosalind Hurley was appointed as chairman of the Medicines Commission for the period 1 January 1986 to 31 December 1993. [23272]

Mr. Malone: All members of the Medicines Commission, including chairmen, are appointed for their wide and recent experience in one of the following activities;

(a) the practice of human or veterinary medicine;

(b) the practice of pharmacy;

(c) chemistry other than pharmaceutical chemistry;

(d) the pharmaceutical industry.

All chairmen since the inception of the commission have been selected for their wide experience and suitable qualities for that role.

Children's Hospital Services, Manchester

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has had from the leader of Manchester city council in relation to children's hospital services in Greater Manchester; what reply he is sending; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement. [23436]

Mr. Horam: We received a letter on 26 March, to which I shall be replying shortly. Children's services are a matter for the six district health authorities in Greater Manchester and the right hon. Member may wish to approach their respective chairmen for more information.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which of he 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23650]

Mr. Horam: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave him today.

Hepatitis C

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what further representations he has had from the Haemophilia Society in regard to people with haemophilia who were infected with hepatitis C by contaminated blood products supplied to them by the NHS; what reply he gave; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement. [23803]

Mr. Horam: I met representatives of the Haemophilia Society on 26 March to discuss its report on haemophilia and hepatitis C which was published in February. The meeting covered a range of issues concerning haemophiliacs infected with hepatitis C and I outlined the action that the Government are taking, including research and support for voluntary organisations working in this field.

Transfers of Undertakings

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what duties (a) health authorities, (b) NHS trusts and (c) private investors have to consult with trade unions or worker representatives where a private finance initiative within the NHS will result in a transfer of undertakings; what time scale applies; what action he will take to ensure changes in the management of national health services falling within the acquired rights directive are negotiated to fulfil transfer of undertakings protection of employment requirements; and if he will make a statement. [24119]

Mr. Malone: The private finance initiative does not affect the obligation of national health service employers to comply with the provisions of employment law.

Under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, employers—including NHS employers—involved in relevant transfers must provide certain information to appropriate representatives of any affected employees long enough before the transfer to enable consultation to take place. An employer who envisages taking measures in connection with the transfer must also consult representatives of any affected employees with a view to seeking their agreement.

Travel Immunisation

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the proposed privatisation of the travel immunisation service. [24183]

Mr. Horam: There is no proposal to privatise travel immunisation.

The Department is reviewing the arrangements for travel vaccines. Inconsistencies and ambiguities have arisen over the years and we are seeking to resolve any anomalies which may exist at present.

Contraceptive Advice (Minors)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance (a) he has issued and (b) he plans to issue to general practitioners concerning information which can be given about patients who are minors to health clinics from whom such patients seek advice on contraception; what are the established procedures for the supply of such information; and if he will review their adequacy. [24364]

Mr. Horam: In March 1986, HC(86)1 was issued to health authorities giving guidance on the provision of contraceptive advice and treatment to young people under 16, exceptionally without their parents' knowledge or consent. It sets out the criteria on which a doctor or health professional must be satisfied before prescribing contraception. Copies of the guidance are available in the Library.

There are no plans to revise this guidance.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 189, how many people have been removed from waiting lists by district in each region in each quarter since 1992. [24379]

Mr. Horam: Reliable information on removals by district is not available centrally.

Spongiform Encephalopathy Research

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the levels of expenditure in 1996 prices on Government-sponsored research into the incidence of (a) scrapie in sheep, (b) bovine spongiform encephalopathy in cattle and (c) Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease in humans for each five-yearly period since 1970 with regard to micro-biological studies. [24439]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave her on 28 March, Official Report, columns 748–49.

Training Expenditure

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 22 March, Official Report, column 383, what has been the expenditure on (a) non-medical education and training and (b) medical and dental postgraduate education and training in each of the years since 1989–90 by region. [24381]

Mr. Malone: The available information will be placed in the Library.

Newbury Hospital

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects construction of the Newbury hospital to begin; and when the hospital will open. [24275]

Mr. Horam: The West Berkshire priority care service national health service trust is in the process of producing plans for a new hospital. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Jim Kerevon, chairman of the trust, for details.

NHS Trusts (Insurance Policies)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy in respect of national health service trusts offering branded insurance policies. [24394]

Mr. Malone: National health service trusts are empowered to generate additional income of NHS patient care by undertaking a range of commercial services activities. There is no objection to NHS trusts offering branded insurance policies provided that:

(a) there is no detriment to NHS services, which must be the top priority for every NHS trust.

(b) there is no unacceptable risk to public funds.

(c) the services make a positive financial contribution which benefits the NHS trust's work for NHS patients.

(d) it is made entirely clear that any insurance policy is in relation to future private treatment and does not confer any advantage whatsoever in relation to NHS treatment.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration the NHS executive has given to allowing trusts to offer preferential treatment to patients participating in any insurance policy or club scheme offered by them. [24363]

Mr. Malone: Treatment of national health service patients is determined by clinical priority alone. NHS trusts must not offer preferential treatment under the NHS to patients participating in any insurance policy or club scheme they offer.

NHS Trusts (Deficits)

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, columns 658-60, about the deficits recorded by NHS trusts in 1994–95, what factors led to the deficits experienced by (a) the East Anglian Ambulance NHS trust, (b) the Mid-Anglia Community Health NHS trust, (c) the Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital NHS trust, (d) the Royal National Throat, Nose and Ear Hospital NHS trust, (e) the Crawley and Horsham NHS trust, (f) the Swindon and Marlborough NHS trust, (g) the Worcester Royal Infirmary NHS trust, (h) the Wolverley NHS trust, (i) the Scarborough and North East Yorkshire Healthcare NHS trust, (j) the Frimley Park Hospital NHS trust, (k) the Bath Mental Health Care NHS trust and (1) the Premier Health NHS trust. [24429]

Mr. Horam: Further information on the factors which led to the deficits in the trusts are matters for the individual trusts concerned. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of the respective trusts for details.

General Practitioners

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the whole-time equivalent number of NHS general medical practitioners working in each family health services association area in England at the latest date for which figures are available. [24382]

Mr. Malone: The information will be placed in the Library.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Hamburger Meat

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the current regulations applying to the supply of beef and meat products to hamburger chains and related outlets. [23072]

Mrs. Browning: Premises engaged in the supply of raw beef hamburgers and meat products are covered by the Minced Meat and Meat Preparation (Hygiene) Regulations 1995 and the Meat Products (Hygiene) Regulations 1994, unless they supply exclusively caterers and/or the final consumer, in which case they are covered by the Food Safety (General Food Hygiene) Regulations 1995.

Organophosphates

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice his Department provides to farmers on the disposal of organophosphate dips; and if he will make a statement. [23190]

Mrs. Browning: Advice on disposal of organophosphorus sheep dips is given in the "Sheep dipping" booklet, AS29, published by the Health and Safety Executive, the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and the Department of the Environment. In 1994, copies of this leaflet were sent to all known sheep farmers in England and, in a Welsh language edition, in Wales. My Department's "code of good agricultural practice for the protection of water," published in 1991, also contains a section on sheep dips. Copies of both documents are available in the Library of the House.

Advice on disposal is also included on the labels and product literature of organophosphorus sheep dips as part of the authorisation procedures for veterinary medicines.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions his Department has had with the organophosphate information network; and if he will make a statement. [23172]

Mrs. Browning: As part of a series of meetings I have been holding with sufferers and sufferers groups this year, I met the leader of the organophosphate information network—OPIN—on 23 February and discussed with her a number of matters relating to OP sheep dips. My officials are also in regular and frequent contact with OPIN on all aspects of the OP sheep dip issue.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce a system of compensation for farmers suffering from organophosphate poisoning who cannot apply for industrial injury benefit; and if he will make a statement. [23175]

Mrs. Browning: I have no plans to introduce such a system. Questions of compensation are a matter between the individual and the company concerned.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidance his Department provides to farmers on the wearing of protective suits when using organophosphate dips; and if he will make a statement. [23191]

Mrs. Browning: Advice on the wearing of personal protective equipment, including protective suits, when using sheep dips, is contained in the "Sheep dipping" booklet, AS29 published jointly by the Health and Safety Executive, the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and the Department of the Environment. The labels and product literature for organophosphorus sheep dips include advice on the precautions to be taken when using the products, including the wearing of protective clothing.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department's advice on the disposal of organophosphate dips conforms with the EC groundwater directive, and if he will make a statement. [23189]

Mrs. Browning: One of the purposes of the "Sheep dipping" booklet, AS29, published jointly by my Department with the Health and Safety Executive, the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and the Department of the Environment, is to provide guidance to users of organophosphate sheep dips on the safe handling, use and disposal of these veterinary medicines.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what arrangements his Department has made since 1992 to ensure that guidance note MS17 from the Health and Safety Executive is circulated to farmers; and if he will make a statement; [23186]

(2) is circulated to doctors; and if he will make a statement. [23528]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have been asked to reply.

For farmers and doctors in general, none, though at the time of publication in 1981 and revisions in 1986 and 1987, it was distributed to a wide variety of relevant journals and publications in the medical, agricultural, horticultural, livestock and forestry fields, in addition to general health and safety and chemical industry publications.

Guidance note MS17 is a specialised document aimed at occupational hygienists and doctors responsible for biological monitoring programmes under the Control of Substances Hazardous to Health Regulations. Most general practitioners do not specialise in occupational hygiene and do not generally need the detailed information provided in MS17.

Meat Inspections

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many inspectors are currently available to carry out meat inspections in each region. [23112]

Mrs. Browning: I have asked the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service to reply to my hon. Friend direct.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Harry Greenway, dated 2 April 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS), your question regarding meat inspection staff has been passed to me for reply. [23112]

The MHS currently employ, nationally, 509 red meat and 163 poultry meat inspectors on a full time basis. In addition it utilises 69 inspectors (62 red meat; 7 white) on fixed term contracts of 100 weeks duration. There is also a pool of 222 staff (203 red; 19 white) used on a casual basis. As you will appreciate, these last two sets of figures in particular fluctuate according to demand.

These meat inspection staff are supervised by Official Veterinary Surgeons (OVSs). The MHS directly employs 39 OVSs and in addition contracts out work to 110 full-time equivalent vets to supplement them. 3 vets are also utilised on a casual basis.

The MHS is divided into 6 regions and the above figures are broken down as shown on the attached table.

Poultry Feed

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the number of poultry which have been fed protein feed in each year since 1989. [23155]

Mrs. Browning: All poultry are fed on a diet which typically contains between 15 and 28 per cent. protein.

Food Safety

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to introduce a food safety strategy. [23111]

Mrs. Browning: My Department's aims, objectives and programmes in the food safety area are set out in the 1996 departmental report, CM 3204, which has just been published.

Pet Food

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to stop the use of potentially infected beef waste in the production of cat and dog food. [23349]

Mrs. Browning: The use of specified bovine offal in feedingstuffs for animals, including pet food, is already prohibited under the Specified Bovine Offal Order 1995.

Cattle Inspectors and Veterinarians

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) cattle inspectors and (b) veterinarians there are (i) in Scotland and (ii) in the rest of the United Kingdom. [23356]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 28 March 1996]: At 1 March 1996, directly employed by the Ministry within the State Veterinary Service there were (a) 23 Ministry technical staff appointed as inspectors under the Animal Health Act 1981 in Scotland and 159 in the rest of Great Britain; (b) 51 veterinary surgeons in Scotland and 247 in the rest of Great Britain.

Meat and Bonemeal Feed

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to ban the import of all animal feedstuffs containing mammalian meat, other animal and butchers' wastes and bonemeal. [23326]

Mrs. Browning: The proposed restrictions on mammalian meat and bonemeal will apply equally to mammalian meat and bonemeal imported from other countries.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the location and volume of stocks of meat bonemeal feed in (a) Scotland and (b) the rest of the United Kingdom. [23355]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 28 March 1996]: Detailed information is not available on the total stocks of meat and bonemeal held in the United Kingdom. However, information is available on the stocks held by all known compounders in Great Britain which produce animal feedingstuffs for sale. The following figures include estimates for such producers in Northern Ireland:

Scotland: 56 tonnes

Rest of the UK: 2,053 tonnes

Food Labelling (Beef Products)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he will take to provide full information to all consumers about beef products contained in foodstuffs; and if he will ban the sales of foodstuffs which do not carry such a description clearly presented. [23229]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 29 March 1996]: The EC food labelling directive requires that the species origin of meat ingredients of all prepacked foodstuffs should be indicated on labels unless the ingredients form part of a composite ingredient which is less than 25 per cent. of the foodstuff. However, the UK also currently permits the use of generic terms for meat and offal ingredients provided that:

(a) in the case of "meat" the labelling of the food does not otherwise refer to a specific type of meat;

(b) in the case of "other meat", this describes meat not otherwise referred to on the label;

(c) in the case of "offal", this refers only to an ingredient of a cooked food.

Following harmonisation of EC member states' legislation on use of generic terms in ingredient lists, the Government published proposals in March 1994 to amend the UK regulations to discontinue the use of these generic descriptions. The changes will be given effect in the consolidated food labelling regulations due to be introduced shortly.

The Government have no plans to ban products which do not comply with these rules.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the underspend within the CAP budget for the current year. [23419]

Mr. Baldry: The Commission's latest estimates suggest an underspend of about 0.7 becu or £0.6 billion.

Fertiliser (Chicken Manure)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has received regarding (a) the suitability or otherwise of chicken litter as an agricultural fertiliser and (b) the supply of chicken litter for fertiliser purposes. [23577]

Mr. Boswell: Poultry manure—including the ashed product from incineration—is a source of various nutrients and is used as a fertiliser. I have no quantitative information on supplies.

Rabies

Sir George Gardiner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the rabies risk assessment referred to by the Chief Veterinary Officer at the seminar organised by the Royal Society of Medicine on 3 May 1995. [23595]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 29 March 1996]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) on 29 February, Official Report, column 710.

Sir George Gardiner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent studies his Department has undertaken into the efficacy of the pet passport scheme introduced in Sweden to exclude rabies; and if he will reconsider his response to the proposals from the Agriculture Committee in its fifth report of Session 1993–94, HC 347. [23697]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 29 March 1996]: Senior officials from my Department visited Norway and Sweden late last year to get a first-hand idea of how their new systems are working. Their impression was that the import controls operating in those countries were far more bureaucratic than our quarantine system, and administratively more expensive to operate.

The Government continue to believe that the time is not yet ripe to introduce changes to the current quarantine arrangements for pet dogs and cats entering the UK.

Imported Meat and Livestock

Mr. Liddington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to test imported livestock and carcases for disease. [23454]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 29 March 1996]: For livestock, other member states of the European Union are obliged to ensure that animals sent to the United Kingdom originate from holdings which are subject to regular official veterinary checks and free from animal health movement restrictions. Animals also have to be accompanied by a valid health certificate signed by an official veterinarian in conformity with Community rules. The certificate details the veterinary checks carried out by the official veterinarian. As a further precaution against disease spread, spot checks are carried out on imported consignments, including some sampling and testing for evidence of disease.

Livestock from third countries can be imported only through an approved border inspection post. Most consignments of livestock must undergo full documentary, identity and physical checks by an official veterinarian at the BIP. Imported livestock from third countries for which the European Community has not agreed harmonised rules are permitted to enter the Untied Kingdom only with a valid import licence, the conditions of which must be met. National and Community animal health conditions for imported livestock include some pre-export and post-import testing requirements.

Similarly, imports of animal products from third countries may enter the Community only via approved BIPs where they are subject to a range of checks to ensure compliance with import rules.

As regards intra-Community trade in products of animal origin, the onus is on the member state of origin to ensure compliance with Community animal and public health rules. These require carcases to be health marked to indicate that they come from an approved slaughter house and to be accompanied by commercial documentation bearing the approval number of that premises. Checks and testing are undertaken here if there is reason to suspect that a consignment does not comply with Community rules.

Appeals Mechanisms

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many appeals mechanisms, as laid out in section 6 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994, he expects to establish by the end of 1996; how many staff each appeals system will employ; and what their estimated annual running costs will be. [23621]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 1 April 1996]: I refer to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 1 April, Official Report, column 18.

Deregulation

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to the oral answer of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 26 February, Official Report, column 576, if he will list those statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament which have been gold plated in the past five years; and what steps he is taking to amend or repeal each piece of gold plating on existing legislation. [23631]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 1 April 1996]: The Government's policy is not to add unnecessary burdens when implementing EC directives. Departments take every opportunity to review existing legislation in the light of this. Officials are currently working on revised guidance to enable Ministers to see where implementing legislation goes beyond the underlying EC directive.

Analysing past statutory instruments and Acts of Parliament to identify those which may have included gold plating would involve disproportionate cost.

Research

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department has spent on research in each year since 1986 to date. [23985]

Mr. Boswell: The Department's total research and development expenditure for each financial year since 1986 is as follows:

Year	£ million
1985–86	118.4
1986–87	118.3
1987–88	113.8
1988–89	115.0
1989–90	112.2
1990–91	119.1
1991–92	121.5
1992–93	132.9
1993–94	135.0
1994–95	137.2
1995–96[1]	139.7

[1] Provisional.

Agricultural Development Advisory Service

Sir Jim Lester: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for the future structure of the agricultural development advisory service; and if he will make a statement. [24701]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Government have announced their intention to transfer the majority of ADAS functions to the private sector. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I are pleased with the progress that ADAS has made and, subject to its performance over the 1996–97 financial year, will be looking to take privatisation forward in the course of 1997.

The Secretary of State and I have agreed to create a new joint agency to take on those ADAS functions that need to be retained in the public sector.

The new agency will work only on behalf of Government customers. In line with Government policy on privatisation, it will not compete for work which is capable of being contracted out to the private sector.

We expect the new agency to comprise around 400 professional staff and are planning for it to come into operation on 1 April 1997.

Fisheries Policy

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made in securing improvements in the common fisheries policy and the management of fisheries in the United Kingdom. [24809]

Mr. Baldry: The information is as follows. With regard to structural measures for the fishing industry, the main underlying problem for fishermen is the poor state of fish stocks and the size of the fishing fleets. Tackling the problem of over-capacity must remain a top priority in fisheries policy, since our fleet cannot have a viable long-term future unless it is properly structured in relation to the available fishing opportunities.

That it why we increased the decommissioning programme by £28 million last year and have recently launched a consultation exercise seeking industry views on how our decommissioning arrangements might be improved. The closing date for comments is 12 April and we aim to have changes in place in time to start the 1996 round soon.

If our fleet reductions are to work they need to be part of an EU-wide policy. We shall join constructively in the discussions and negotiations in the Fisheries Council on the future arrangements for bringing the European fleet as a whole better into line with fishing opportunities. We have already started discussions by holding seven meetings in different parts of the UK to enable the European Commission to meet our industry and to hear at first hand the views of our fishermen.

The need to adapt applies equally to ports, to on-shore facilities and to the processing industry. We have therefore announced that we are going ahead with grant support schemes under the EU's financial instrument for fisheries guidance. This is in addition to the continuing national harbour grants scheme and existing vessel safety measures.

The UK will also benefit by up to £36 million of aid under the PESCA initiative targeted specially at the needs of fishery-dependent areas. Again there will be supporting national, regional and local assistance.

On fisheries management, the Government have made clear our determination to deal with the problem of quota hoppers. These vessels, although registered in the UK, are effectively owned abroad yet fish against UK quotas and yield little or no benefit to our fishing communities.

Quota hoppers now account for 20 per cent. of the tonnage of our offshore fleet and take about 10 per cent. of our whitefish quota, most of which is landed abroad. This cannot go on and we must be able to ensure that our fishing communities and related industries derive real benefit from the national quotas allocated under the CFP. As announced in March, we are raising this issue in the intergovernmental conference and, if needed, treaty changes will be sought. We have already secured the Commission's agreement that they will study with us the scope for taking practical and effective steps to regulate quota hopping within the existing framework of Community law.

The system of quota management is often criticised by fishermen. This is not surprising when quotas have to be set at low levels in response to falling fish stocks. The industry has been invited to make its own suggestions for improvements to the system we apply in the UK. At the annual review meeting in November, the industry agreed that no significant changes should be made for 1996. However, the Government remain open to any constructive ideas which are likely to be acceptable to the industry as a whole.

As part of our quota management policy, we have made clear our commitment to seeking ways to reduce the adverse effect on the Northern Irish industry of Hague preference in the Irish sea.

With regard to fisheries conservation and science, UK fishermen have laid great emphasis on the importance that they attach to effective technical conservation measures. This is absolutely right, and to address the problems of fisheries conservation, including discards and industrial fishing, I set up a fisheries conservation group consisting of fishermen, scientists and other Government experts to look at the options for new technical measures to help conserve stocks. This will ensure that the UK industry has every opportunity to have the maximum influence on the new Community measures which, at our request, are to be agreed by the end of the year.

We need to increase our understanding of the impact of industrial fisheries on other stocks and on the wider marine ecosystem. At the April Fisheries Council, I shall therefore call for a collaborative research effort in this important area and press the European Commission to propose the introduction of a precautionary total allowable catch for the large sandeel fishery.

A further area which clearly needs serious attention by the fishing industry and fisheries scientists is the understanding of fisheries science and the use by the scientists of the best advice from commercial fishermen. I have set out on a number of occasions the importance of fisheries science in policy decision, including my speech at the University of East Anglia last November explaining the key role which science must play in policy making. We have now initiated a series of regular contacts between industry representatives and our scientists in order to increase fishermen's understanding of the work done by the scientists and to give the industry the opportunity to question the scientists and contribute their own expertise. This will be followed up by meetings between the industry and our scientists in advance of formulating our input into the international scientific advice on the state of the various stocks. I hope that these contacts will result in future in better-informed decisions and a better understanding of how we reach decisions on fisheries management.

As for community arrangements at a community leve,l there is scope for improving the role of the fishing industry in decision making and in getting a clearer regional influence so that those most directly affected by decisions are heard more clearly. I have already put this idea to the Commission and the initial reaction was very encouraging. I shall be taking this up further at the April Fisheries Council when I shall propose the introduction of regional consultative committees to bring together fishermen and officials from the member states active in a particular fishery to discuss issues relevant to that fishery. These committees would cover areas such as the North sea and English channel and could consider any issue of regional relevance, such as the most suitable technical conservation measures and the state of fish stocks.

On the longer-term arrangements for the CFP, we are open to constructive suggestions from the UK industry in particular in relation to the 2002 review. On one important point—the six and 12-mile limits—we have already made it clear that they are not negotiable. The Commissioner has herself acknowledged the desirability of having a clear statement about the future and I shall be seeking to build on this.

On fish marketing, we have encouraged the industry to respond constructively to changing needs, in particular by making better use of the system of producers' organisations. Producers' organisations have already evolved in response to changing conditions in the industry. In the light of those changes, and the recommendations of the recent Sea Fish Industry Authority task force report, we are launching a consultation on the role and function of fish producers' organisations. We will also be seeking views on how various changes to EU legislation on recognition and supervision of producers' organisations should be implemented in the UK.

The importance of the fish market is also reflected in the agreement of Ministers to an increased levy rate of the Sea Fish Industry Authority which will provide funds for their promotional work and open the way for a significant contribution from EU aid.

In conclusion, these are not easy times for the fishing industry. The Government recognise that we are facing a number of difficult issues both on the operation of the CFP and because of the decline in fish stocks. That is why we are taking initiatives across the whole range of fisheries policy in the way that I have described.

Public Bodies

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 13 March 1996, Official Report, column 629, if he will give the figures for (a) running costs and (b) expenditure on consultants by each of the five listed non-departmental public bodies in each of the past five years, using the new definition of running costs. [22804]

Mr. Hague [holding answer 22 March 1996]: Expenditure on running costs incurred prior to 1 April 1996 was not recorded in the format requested and cannot be produced. Available information on outturn expenditure on running costs and consultants for each of the five non-departmental public bodies is as follows:

Oil Pollution (Sea Empress Incident)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment his Department has made of the economic impact of the Sea Empress disaster on (a) local business activity, (b) local tourism and (c) the fishing industry. [23392]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Compensation is available to businesses which have suffered economic loss caused by pollution damage from the Sea Empress. My right hon. Friend is monitoring the situation and maintaining close links with the Wales tourist board, Pembrokeshire county council, and organisations representing local fishing interests.

Home Energy Conservation Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many senior citizens households over 60 years of age will not now be eligible for home energy conservation grants because of means testing. [23747]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Planning, Construction and Energy Efficiency, to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Griffiths) on 26 March, Official Report, column 825.

Hedgerows and Headlands (Conservation)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he has given to farmers concerning the preservation of hedgerows and headlands. [23564]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office has published a "Guide to Hedgerow Management and Establishment" in conjunction with ADAS and the Countryside Council for Wales.

Advice is also given on the management of both hedgerows and headlands under the environmentally sensitive area scheme and on hedgerows under other environmental measures. All schemes are supported by appropriate explanatory literature. The council also provides advice and supporting literature under the hedgerow renovation scheme.

Right to Buy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many local people have exercised their right to buy their council house by each local authority giving the sales receipts total for each local authority up to the latest possible date; and if he will make a statement. [23750]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The available information is given in the following table:

Horticultural Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy on the horticultural industry; and if he will make a statement. [23531]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Government's policy on horticulture is set out in the joint memorandum which the Agriculture Departments submitted to the Agriculture Committee on 30 November 1994, House of Commons Paper No. 61–11, Session 1994–95, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Departmental Staff (Location)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer on 19 March, Official Report, column 172, how many civil servants work at each location within Wales. [23572]

Mr. Hague: The number of permanent full-time equivalent Welsh Office staff, excluding Cadw, by location are as follows:

	Number
London	28
Cardiff	1,463
Caernarfon	101
Carmarthen	93
Llandrindod Wells	130
Lampeter	6
Colwyn Bay	29

Ruthin	6
Holyhead	1
Conwy	2

1. From 1 April Welsh Office staff at Aberystwyth office transferred to the Veterinary Laboratories Agency.
2. From 1 April there have been no Welsh Office staff based at the Newport office. The area will be covered from the Brecon office.
3. The figures do not include staff on maternity leave, career breaks and secondment.

Negative Equity

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the number of home owners currently suffering negative equity. [23745]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Estimates of negative equity are prepared by the Department of the Environment on the basis of a house price index. The estimates are sensitive to the assumptions made and are only intended to provide a broad indication of the level of negative equity. An estimated 11,000 homeowners were suffering negative equity during the third quarter of 1995.

Air Quality Monitoring

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will increase his funding to local authorities to enable them to measure air quality; and if he will make a statement. [23749]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Under the Environment Act 1995 local authorities will have new duties in respect of air quality. Phased implementation of the new duties, involving a representative number of local authorities in Wales, England and Scotland, will commence in 1996–97. Special grant support is being provided to those authorities to cover any necessary increased expenditure.

This first phase will enable the Government to assess the resource implications of implementing the new local authority duties and will inform decisions on any Government support that might be required.

Beef Farmers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to introduce special financial measures to assist beef farmers following Government statements on bovine spongiform encephalopathy and Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. [23408]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Mechanisms for market support already exist within the common agricultural policy for intervention purchases of beef from steers. In addition, we have announced that we will adopt the EU scheme to provide aid to farmers for the slaughter of young male calves from dairy herds. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is today discussing in Council how best to restore confidence in the beef market.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of farmers who depend principally upon beef farming. [23409]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: According to the particular farm types in the June 1995 agricultural census, there are an estimated 3,625 farm holdings in Wales where the principal activity is beef farming.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the current size of the beef herd. [23407]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: At June 1995 there were an estimated 218,900 cows in the Welsh beef breeding herd.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent discussions he has had with the farmers unions concerning BSE and CJD; and if he will make a statement. [23410]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the farming unions on 21 March to discuss the announcements made the previous day regarding BSE and CJD by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. I met the Farmers Union of Wales on 27 March. The Welsh Office will continue to keep in touch with the farming unions on these matters.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) cases of BSE and (b) affected farms in Wales and its constituent counties there have been broken down by (i) pedigree beef herds, (ii) mixed beef and dairy farms and (iii) dairy-only herds. [24386]

Mr. Hague: The number of BSE cases and affected farms in Wales broken down by dairy, mixed beef herds as at 29 March 1996 and pedigree beef herds as at 9 March 1996 is as follows:

County	Cases in dairy herds	Farms	Cases in mixed herds	Farms	Cases in beef herds	Farms	Cases in pedigree beef herds	Farms
Clwyd	1,865	493	91	37	478	162	1	1

Countryside Stewardship Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the countryside stewardship scheme. [23565]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The countryside stewardship scheme is administered by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in England. Within Wales, the experimental Tir Cymen scheme, administered by the Countryside Council for Wales, seeks to combine effective farming with whole farm conservation.

Historic Buildings (Restoration Materials)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure that there is an adequate supply of Welsh slate and other industrial building materials needed for the authentic restoration of Wales's historic buildings; and if he will make a statement. [23526]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I am not aware of any significant shortage in the supply of appropriate materials.

Farm Animal Welfare

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his policy concerning the welfare of farm animals. [23532]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The welfare of livestock on agricultural land is protected in Great Britain by the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968 which makes it an offence to cause unnecessary distress or pain to any livestock. Subordinate legislation and associated welfare codes lay down more detailed requirements which are enforced by the State Veterinary Service.

A465

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will state the number of (a) deaths, (b) injuries and (c) accidents on the A465 heads of the valleys since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [23821]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is in the following table. The data which cover personal injury accidents recorded by the police, relate to the entire length of the A465.

	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995
Deaths	9	6	10	6	5	7
Injuries	183	180	167	178	153	250
Accidents	110	108	100	101	98	131

New Residents

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of individuals who moved residence from England to Wales in 1995; and if he will make a statement. [23827]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The latest available figure for 1995 is from the national health service central register for the 12 months ending September which shows some 52,500 people previously registered in England as having registered with an NHS doctor in Wales. This count excludes armed forces personnel and any others not registered with an NHS doctor.

Crash Barriers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many miles of (a) dual carriageway and (b) motorway in Wales are without crash barriers; and if he will make a statement. [23830]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are 14.78 miles of trunk road dual carriageway in Wales without central reserve safety fencing, details for non-trunk roads are not held by the Department. There is central reserve fencing on the entire length of the M4 in Wales.

Development Projects (EU Funding)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the development projects in Wales that have attracted grants from the European regional development fund since 1994; on what dates the grants were given; and if he will make a statement. [23973]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Under the objective 5b rural Wales single programming document 1994–1999 and the objective 2 industrial south Wales single programming document 1994–1996, more than 430 projects have been approved to receive grant assistance from the European regional development fund resources available to these programmes. The lists of projects approved for grant were published in Welsh Office press notice dated 24 August 1995, 5 February 1996 and 18 March 1996 and copies are available in the Library of the House. The dates on which the approval letters were issued and when payments on claims have been made will vary in each individual case.

County Council Social Services

Mr. John Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what machinery is available to consider current complaints involving county council social services when those councils are abolished on 31 March. [24293]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Under section 53 of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994, responsibility for dealing with the complaint transfers to the new authority or authorities for the area to which the complaint relates.

The section ensures that the new authorities inherit the implications of any decisions taken by the old authorities—anything done by an old authority shall be deemed to have been done by the new authority for its continuing effect.

Environmental Issues

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will place a copy of his speech made on 27 March, at Bangor, and concerning environmental issues in Wales, in the Library. [24474]

Mr. Hague: Yes, I have placed a copy in the Library.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minster are the responsibility of his Department of those which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23646]

Mr. Hague: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to him today by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

Basketball

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assistance has been given (a) in cash and (b) in other ways by his Department or its agencies towards the maintenance and development of basketball in each of the last 10 years. [24122]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office has given no direct assistance towards the maintenance and development of basketball. The Sports Council for Wales has provided grant aid to the Basketball Association of Wales as follows:

1985–86: £8,400
1986–87: £8,165
1987–88: £9,000
1988–89: £26,105
1989–90: £44,849
1990–91: £32,040
1991–92: £39,049
1992–93: £42,577
1993–94: £52,284
1994–95: £53,194
1995–96: £46,057.

In addition, under Sportsmatch, the Government's business sponsorship incentive scheme for sport launched in 1992, the council has made grant awards totalling £10,500 to the sport of basketball.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the unitary councils giving the names in (a) Welsh and (b) English as set out in the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 and indicating which have sought a change of name and the names sought in (i) Welsh and (ii) English. [23914]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The names of the unitary authorities as set out in the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 are as follows:

English	Welsh
Counties
Anglesey	Sir Fôn
Caernarfonshire and Merionethshire	Sir Gaernarfon a Meirionnydd
Cardiff	Caerdydd
Cardiganshire	Sir Aberteifi
Carmarthenshire	Sir Gaerfyrddin
Denbighshire	Sir Dbinbych
Flintshire	Sir y Fflint
Monmouthshire	Sir Fynwy
Pembrokeshire	Sir Benfro
Powys	Powys
Swansea	Abertawe
County Boroughs
Aberconwy and Colwyn	Aberconwy a Cholwyn
Blaenau Gwent	Blaenau Gwent
Bridgend	Pen-y-bont ar Ogwr
Caerphilly	Caerffili
Merthyr Tydfil	Merthyr Tudful
Neath and Port Talbot	Castell-nedd a Phort Talbot
Newport	Casnewydd
Rhondda, Cynon, Taff	Rhondda, Cynon, Taf
Torfaen	Tor-faen
The Vale of Glamorgan	Bro Morgannwg
Wrexham	Wrecsam

Five councils have sought and been given consent by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales for a change of name.

They are:

Old name	New name
Anglesey	Isle of Anglesey
Sir Fôn	Sir Ynys Môn
Caernarfonshire and Merionethshire	Gwynedd
Sir Gaernarfon a Meirionnydd	Gwynedd
Neath and Port Talbot	Neath Port Talbot
Castell-nedd a Phort Talbot	Castell-nedd Port Talbot
Aberconwy and Colwyn	Conwy
Aberconwy a Cholwyn	Conwy
Cardiganshire	Ceredigion
Sir Aberteifi	Sir Ceredigion

The changes take effect from 2 April 1996.

Child Abuse, North Wales (Report)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, how many copies of the John Jillings report into child sex and physical abuse in north Wales children's homes were supplied to the social services inspectorate of his Department; when they were obtained; if they were obtained initially in draft; what requests they have received to return those copies for pulping; what the inspectorate's response was; and if he will make a statement. [24430]

Mr. Hague: Five copies of a draft of the Jillings report were sent to the Chief Inspector of Social Services for Wales by Clwyd county council on 22 February so that a check could be made for factual accuracy. We understand that, at the end of last week, Clwyd county council was seeking some 200 amendments to the report. The acting director of social services of Clwyd county council wrote to the social services inspectorate for Wales on 22 March seeking the return of the "uncorrected" copies. The Department has retained these copies and is still awaiting receipt of the report in its final form. When the final version is received, the copies will be returned.

Cardiff Bay Development Corporation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, column 721, what were the principal components of the consultancy expenditures by the Cardiff Bay development corporation in (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96 and (c) agreed or expected for 1996–97. [24427]

Mr. Hague: The detail of this expenditure is an operational matter for the corporation. I will ask the chief executive to write to the hon. Member and will arrange for a copy of his response to be placed in the Library.

Television Licences

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many people in Wales have been prosecuted over the last five years for failure to pay for television licences; and if he will make a statement; [23250]

(2) how many people have been prosecuted over the last five years for failure to pay for television licences; and if he will make a statement. [23286]

Mr. Sproat: I have been asked to reply.

The number of people in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Wales prosecuted for television licence evasion, in each of the last five financial years, is approximately as follows:

	United Kingdom[1]	Wales[2]
1990–91	183,000	12,800
1991–92	209,000	13,500
1992–93	232,000	15,700
1993–94	219,000	13,600
1994–95	210,000	12,600

[1] Rounded to nearest 1,000.
[2] Rounded to nearest 100.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

St. George's, Hanover Square

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if the Church Commissioners take (a) the £7,000 annual payments from the charitable funds of St. George's, Hanover square, paid into the incumbents in the old St. George's parish area and (b) the £3,500 payments to the assistant curate into account when paying their stipends. [23780]

Mr. Alison: Individual stipend levels are set by dioceses subject to certain understandings as to minimum levels. Dioceses take into account income from local trusts—such as those from the charitable funds of St.

George, Hanover square. This follows the method for computing income for augmentation purposes approved by the General Synod in 1975. As a result, the incumbent of St. George, Hanover square receives no augmentation from the diocese of London and his stipend consists almost entirely of income from local charitable funds—with the exception of certain small statutory amounts paid to every incumbent from the Church Commissioners' funds. The assistant curate receives no income from these charitable funds.

St. Ethelburga Rebuilding Programme

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, what steps the commissioners took to ensure fair competition in appointing the architect for the St. Ethelburga's rebuilding programme. [23781]

Mr. Alison: St. Ethelburga is technically a redundant church vesting in the London diocese, which has yet to make a formal proposal to the Church Commissioners for its future use.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the average time required by his Department to issue a new contracting-out certificate, after receipt of the application. [23122]

Mr. Heald: The issue of new contracting-out certificates is the responsibility of the Occupational Pensions Board.

Since April 1995, the OPB has issued all new certificates within its target of five days of receipt of all correctly completed documentation.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the statutory timetable for conducting (a) the consultation procedures for the purposes of sections 16 to 21 of the Pensions Act 1995, (b) the consequential nomination and selection of member-nominated trustees or directors and (c) the consultation procedure in connection with an application for a contracting-out certificate under the amended contracting-out requirements inserted by the Pensions Act 1995. [23124]

Mr. Heald: We propose to introduce regulations which will give trustees six months to obtain approval for nomination and selection rules and to implement the appointment of member-nominated trustees or directors. Employers will also have six months in which to secure the approval of scheme members for any alternative to member-nominated trustees or directors. The trustees' six months will run from the date on which the employer gives notice that he does not wish either to make, or to continue with, an alternative proposal.

The regulations will contain transitional provisions which will permit schemes to start the consultation procedures from October 1996 and will allow the balance of any time between October 1996 and April 1997 not used by the employer to be added to the trustees' statutory six months.

There is currently no statutory timetable for conducting the consultation process required in connection with an application for a contracting-out certificate and we have no plans to change this for applications made after 6 April 1997.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) employments and (b) earners currently contracted out he estimates will cease to be contracted out, following the commencement of the Pensions Act 1995. [23127]

Mr. Heald: The provisions of the Pensions Act 1995, including the new flexibilities proposed for contracted-out mixed-benefit schemes, are designed to ensure that contracting out remains an attractive option for the future.

In his report on the effect of the financial provisions of the Pensions Bill 1994 on the national insurance fund—Cm 2714—the Government Actuary provided details of the assumptions used to determine the estimates of the number of contributions contracted out during the period covered by the report.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what advice his Department has issued as to the date by which employers commence the three-month statutory consultation procedure required for an employment to be contracted out. [23131]

Mr. Heald: The Occupational Pensions Board has issued guidance on the procedures for elections to contract out and consultation. There is no statutory three-month period of consultation. There is, however, a statutory requirement on the employer to issue a notice of intention to contract out which will normally be for a period of three months.

How the consultation process is to be conducted is not laid down in legislation, although the OPB recommends that, as a matter of good practice, consultation should be started in advance of giving notice of intention to contract out.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if his Department will advise members of occupational pension schemes who are aged just over a year before the scheme's normal pension age to transfer to a personal pension scheme; and what estimates his Department has made of the effect on the cash flow of occupational pension schemes of such transfer. [23195]

Mr. Heald: No. I recommend anyone considering such a transfer to seek financial advice. General information on transferring into a personal pension is, however, contained in leaflet "PP 1" published by the Department. The Securities and Investments Board also publishes fact sheets for people considering opting out of their employer's scheme and transferring to a personal pension.

An estimate of the cash flow effects on occupational schemes would not be worthwhile in the absence of any firm evidence that significant numbers of such transfers would take place.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the results of the compliance cost assessment conducted by his Department in respect of the administrative cost imposed on employers and occupational pension schemes of implementing the changes in contracting-out arrangements. [23125]

Mr. Heald: The compliance cost assessment in respect of the Pensions Bill of 1994 was published in December 1994 and was updated in April 1995. It takes into account the implications for employers and schemes of the changes to the contracting-out arrangements. The CCA will shortly be further updated to reflect the impact of the provisions contained in secondary legislation.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the consistency of his proposal concerning the treatment of pensioners' rights on wind-up of an occupational scheme with section 67 of the Pensions Act 1995. [23159]

Mr. Heald: The statutory priority order which trustees will have to follow when a scheme subject to the minimum funding requirement winds up will not change any member's rights. A scheme with sufficient funds to meet all of its liabilities will be able to discharge them in full.

If a scheme winds up in deficit, that statutory priority order will ensure an equitable distribution of the assets. It will protect pensions in payment by giving them a high priority.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will issue guidance to non-public service occupational pension schemes on the treatment of guaranteed minimum pensions accruing in respect of pensionable service between 17 May 1990 and 5 April 1997; [23713]

(2) what guidance the Occupational Pensions Board has provided to occupational pension schemes or their administrators on the application of equal treatment requirements to guaranteed minimum pensions accruing from pensionable service completed between 17 May 1990 and 5 April 1997. [23712]

Mr. Heald: Neither the Department of Social Security nor the Occupational Pensions Board has issued guidance to occupational pension schemes in respect of equal treatment and guaranteed minimum pensions in the period 17 May 1990 to 5 April 1997 and none is planned.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will introduce regulations to ensure that professional advisers to occupational pension schemes are not obliged to report to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority failures to conform with statutory requirements which have been rectified (a) before they come to the attention of the professional adviser and (b) within one month of being drawn to the attention of the trustees or managers of the scheme, where, in each case, no scheme member or beneficiary suffers loss as a result; [23714]

(2) if (a) he or (b) the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority will give guidance to occupational pensions scheme actuaries and auditors, on insignificant infringements of the Pensions Act 1995 which need not be reported to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority; [23762]

(3) if he will direct the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority to seek to reach an understanding with relevant professional bodies before 6 April 1997, to ensure that those bodies issue guidance to limit reports of trivial infringements of the Pensions Act 1995. [23722]

Mr. Heald: We do not intend to introduce any regulations or issue any guidance on these matters. It will be for professional advisers, using their specialist knowledge and experience, to decide whether a matter is of material significance to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority and should, therefore, be reported. Equally, it will be for the authority to decide what action to take in response to such reports and whether, in the light of any investigation, any penalty is appropriate.

It is, of course, open to the relevant professional bodies and the authority to issue guidance on these matters, if they consider it appropriate to do so. Indeed, we understand that the Auditing Practices Board and the Institute and the Faculty of Actuaries are considering guidance on the duty to report to the authority.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many notifications of breaches of the Pensions Act 1995 or regulations made under it he expects the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority to receive (a) in the first six months and (b) subsequently on an annual basis; and what proportion of these he expects the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority to take action on; [23734]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of instances where professional advisers will be obliged to make reports to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority between 6 April 1997 and 5 July 1997; and what assessment he has made of the staff and resources available to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority to enable it to deal with the above estimate. [23715]

Mr. Heald: It is not possible to forecast accurately the number of notifications of breaches that the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority will receive, as the authority will be enforcing new legislation in areas not presently subject to such a high degree of regulation. However, for resourcing purposes, estimates of overall work loads for the authority have been based on the number of inquiries currently received by the occupational pensions advisory service and on the experience of the Irish Pensions Board. On this basis, it has been estimated that the authority might expect to receive approximately 30,000 notifications in a full year from all sources. Of these cases, it is estimated that up to 20 per cent. might require the authority to consider taking some further form of regulatory or enforcement action, beyond initial investigation.

Reports from professional advisers will be only one of the many sources of notifications about problems with schemes available to the Occupational Pensions Regulatory Authority. It will be for the authority to decide the level of staff and resources it should make available to deal with such reports.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security to what level of accuracy and within what time scale he will require the Contributions Agency to make payments on his behalf to trustees or managers of contracted-out money purchase occupational pension schemes in accordance with the provision of section 42A of the Pension Schemes Act 1993; and if this will vary if an earner has been employed in more than one contracted-out money purchase pension scheme, simultaneously or consecutively, in a single year. [23123]

Mr. Heald: The administration of the Contributions Agency is a matter for Mrs. Faith Boardman, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from George Bertram to Mr. John Denham, dated 1 April 1996:

As the Chief Executive of the Contributions Agency is away from the office on annual leave, I have responsibility for answering questions about operational matters relating to the agency and the National Insurance (NI) scheme in her absence.

I have been asked to reply to your question regarding the Contributions Agency's accuracy levels and timescales for making payments to trustees or managers of Contracted-Out Money Purchase schemes and if this varies if any earner has been a member of more than one.

Following the end of each tax year the Agency receives, checks and processes approximately 40 million end-of-year returns (forms P14), containing National Insurance contributions and related earnings information. Because of the number involved the processing of forms P14 is spread over a period of months. The bulk of the processing is completed during the months from April to October, by which time approximately 90% of forms P14 are recorded on National Insurance accounts.

The Agency will be required to make the payments in question to 100% accuracy within one month of acceptable National Insurance contributions and related earnings information being recorded on earners National Insurance accounts. Where an earner has been a member of more than one Contracted-Out Money Purchase scheme separate such payments will be made to the respective schemes as and when the related earnings information is recorded.

I hope you will find this reply helpful.

Incapacity Benefit

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people who have applied for incapacity benefit but failed the all work test were formerly receiving invalidity benefit. [23729]

Mr. Burt: Up to the end of November 1995, approximately 34,000[1] former recipients of invalidity benefit had been found capable of work following the all work test of incapacity.

[1] Source: 5 per cent. extract from the incapacity benefit computer system.

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the operation of incapacity benefit. [24541]

Mr. Burt: The introduction of incapacity benefit was a major undertaking. In the light of practical experience so far, we are looking at ways of improving the administration of the benefit. Any changes will be tested and evaluated before they are adopted nationally. Three projects to test variations in detailed administrative procedures have been established based in Glasgow, Leeds and the south-east of England, to take this work forward.

Unclaimed Benefits (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the total amount of unclaimed benefits in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [23527]

Mr. Roger Evans: A reliable estimate could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Actors

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will take steps to ensure that actors can continue to pay the higher class 1 national insurance; and if he will make a statement. [24011]

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to remove actors from class 1 national insurance contributions and stop them claiming unemployment benefit between roles; what cost-benefit analysis he has conducted in respect of such plans; and if he will make a statement. [24075]

Mr. Heald: I refer the right hon. and hon. Member to the replies I gave to the hon. Members for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 1 April.

National Insurance

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the annual yield from employers' national insurance levied on salaries subsequently used by employees to make personal pension contributions. [23981]

Mr. Heald: Such estimates as are available are in the table.

Employers' National Insurance Contributions (NICS) paid in respect of employees with Personal Pensions.

£ billion

Year	Amount of Employers' NICs
	Annual total	Cumulative total
1987–88	2.1	2.1
1988–89	2.6	4.7
1989–90	3.5	8.2
1990–91	4.1	12.3
1991–92	4.4	16.7
1992–93	4.7	21.4
1993–94	4.8	26.2

Notes:

1. There are no data available on that part of the earnings of personal pension holders which falls above the upper earnings limit. The calculations have therefore been made on the assumption that those with earnings above the UEL earned the same amount on average as all employees with earnings above the UEL in each year. They also assume that earnings are constant on a weekly or monthly basis throughout the year.
2. Employers' NICs are not payable where total earnings are below the annual lower earnings limit.

Disability Discrimination Act 1985

Sir Nicholas Scott: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which sections of the Disability Discrimination Act 1985 are now in effect; and what plans he has for bringing further sections into effect. [24376]

Mr. Burt: The Disability Discrimination Act received Royal Assent on 8 November 1995. The National Disability Council was established in January 1996 to advise the Government on the implementation of the Act. It has already prepared its proposals for a code of practice which are currently the subject of public consultation. The Government plan to implement the new employment rights and the initial rights of access to goods, facilities and services around the end of this year. The remaining rights will be implemented over a period of time, the length of which is subject to public consultation.

The education provisions are to be introduced over the next 18 months, with the first provisions coming into force in July 1996. The Department of Transport will be consulting in the near future on the transport provisions in the Act.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those which (a) have been repealed or amended, and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23654]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to him by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster today.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) landlords and (b) agents in the last available year received housing benefit payments of more than £1 million from local authorities. [23779]

Mr. Roger Evans: This information is not available.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to reply to the second report of the Social Security Committee of Session 1995–96 on the performance and operation of the Child Support Agency, HC 50. [24700]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The Government's reply is published today. The Committee's report is a useful and thorough examination of the work of the Child Support Agency. As the Committee commented, considerable progress has been made in increasing the quality of administration and there is now a growing acceptance that the CSA will be a permanent feature of British life.

The Committee makes 20 detailed recommendations aimed at further improving the quality of administration in the agency. The Government welcome these recommendations and respond to each in their reply. The reply indicates what action it will take to implement them, or for those recommendations which cannot be accepted in full, explains what other action will be taken to achieve the intended objectives.

At the same time, the agency will be sending the Committee a report of its investigation of the operation of the good cause provisions in child support. This thorough investigation, which was conducted at the request of the Committee, has shown that while the agency is operating a policy satisfactorily and as intended, providing protection to those parents with care who need it, the report has also identified potential abuses of the provisions, and suggests a number of ways in which good cause procedures can be improved. I have asked the agency to implement these improvements straight away where possible.

For the future, the report indicates that there may be a need to enhance the incentives to co-operate with the agency. I am determined to respond to indications that some parents may be abusing benefit and child support provisions and I am seeking the Committee's views on ways to tackle this problem.

We remain committed to a child support system that ensures that all parents meet their responsibilities to their children. To this end, we welcome all constructive suggestions for improving the service that the CSA offers to its clients. The Government look forward to further discussions with the Social Security Committee.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the time taken by the Child Support Agency to clear (a) 25 per cent., (b) 50 per cent. and (c) 75 per cent. of requests for reviews of child maintenance. [23328]

Mr. Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 1 April 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State requesting information on the time taken by the Child Support Agency to clear requests for reviews of child maintenance.

Information on clearances of Second Tier Reviews is not collected in the percentage bands requested in your question. The Agency measures performance in accordance with Secretary of State's target for Second Tier Reviews by recording the percentage of reviews i) cleared within 13 weeks, ii) cleared within 26 weeks and iii) outstanding more than 26 weeks.

Performance at the end of February 1996, was as follows;

53% of second tier reviews were cleared within 13 weeks.

71% were cleared within 26 weeks.

27% were outstanding for more than 26 weeks.

Actual numbers of Second Tier Reviews received, cleared and on hand are published monthly in the House of Commons Library report.

I hope this is helpful.

Allowance for Lowered Standard of Occupation

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will make a statement relating to the case of a constituent of Cunninghame, South, national insurance number YM 61 93 54 D, indicating under what legislation he can appeal against the withdrawal of his award of allowance for lowered standard of occupation; which agency will reach a decision on this appeal; and for what reasons on 12 March a letter from the War Pensions Agency indicated to him that he could not be supplied with a copy of the legislation governing allowance for lowered standard of occupation in relation to his case due to copyright laws; [23992]

(2) what factors led the War Pensions Agency to change the reference system used on the payment books for the allowance for lowered standard of occupation; when people in receipt of ALSO were asked to return these payment books; and how many of these were subsequently advised whilst the War Pensions Agency was replacing the reference numbers on their payment books that the level of payments of ALSO to them were being reduced; [23773]

(3) how many applicants in receipt of allowance for lowered standard of occupation have had their awards (a) reduced and (b) withdrawn; how much in benefits these applicants have lost as a result of this change; what are the reasons for these changes; and how long his Department has been incorrectly administering legislation in relation to ALSO; [23774]

(4) if he will make a statement relating to the case of a constituent of Cunninghame, South, national insurance number YM 61 93 54 D, indicating under what legislation his award of allowance for lowered standard of occupation was cancelled with effect from 3 April; for what reasons his award was reduced; when the mistake by his Department in relation to his award came to light; and what factors underlay the time taken by his Department to notice this mistake; [23993]

(5) if he will make a statement relating to the case of a constituent of Cunninghame, South, national insurance number YM 61 93 54 D, indicating under what legislation he was awarded his allowance for lowered standard of occupation on 20 July 1988. [23991]

Mr. Heald: These are matters for Mr. Kevin Caldwell, chief executive of the War Pensions Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from K. C. Caldwell to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 1 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions about the Allowance for Lowered Standard of Occupation (ALSO).

Awards of ALSO are made under article 21 of the Naval, Military and Air Forces Etc. (Disablement and Death) Service Pensions Order 1983 (SPO). This legislation provides that ALSO may be awarded where the war pensioned disablement is such as to render a pensioner incapable, and likely to remain permanently incapable, of following his regular occupation. He must also be incapable of following any other suitable occupation which is of an equivalent standard.

At the end of 1994, it came to light that some awards of ALSO were based on an incorrect interpretation of the law. The error was considering only whether a pensioner could get back into service and whether civilian earnings were less than service earnings. Payments had therefore been made where the war pensioned disablement had had no effect on ability to follow the service occupation. The Secretary of State decided, therefore, to review all awards of ALSO to ensure they were soundly based. Article 67 of the SPO provides the power for the Secretary of State to withdraw any award found to be incorrectly made. No awards of ALSO are to be reduced but a total of 1301 pensioners are to have their ALSO withdrawn. The Secretary of State decided to exercise his discretion to continue all awards found to be incorrectly made until he had examined all appropriate cases and that all incorrect awards should be withdrawn from the common date of 3 April 1996. No-one will be asked to repay any money for ALSO, either already paid, or to be paid up to 3 April.

Those pensioners who, once ALSO has been cancelled, will continue to receive payment by order book for other awards under the War Pension scheme were notified on 14 March 1996 that a replacement book would be issued within a few days. They were then notified on 21 March 1996 of the arrangements for returning the old book. The remainder, whose regular War Pension payment consisted solely of ALSO, were notified on 21 March 1996 of the arrangements for returning their books.

You asked what factors underlay the time taken by the Department to notice the mistake. The original legislation, which was introduced in 1946, was to compensate the war time conscript, who, because of his war pensioned disablement, could no longer do the civilian job he had done before call-up. The legislation became much less clear cut as a result of amendments introduced in the 1970's to bring career servicemen and women within the scope of the allowance. The incorrect interpretation of the legislation had its roots in those 1970s legislative changes The majority of awards to be withdrawn were made in the 1990s and are being paid at the current maximum rate of £38.12 a week.

You ask under what legislation an appeal my be made against the decision to withdraw ALSO. Under the Pensions Appeal Tribunals Act 1943 there is no right of appeal against a decision on a war pensions supplementary allowance. These decisions are administrative in character and are made by the Secretary of State in exercise of the power conferred on him by article 70, as the sole interpreter and administrator of the Order. As such, his decisions are susceptible to challenge only by judicial review.

You also ask about your constituent (NINO YM619354D). He received a Gratuity, under the War Pensions Scheme for disablement assessed at 6–14 per cent. and currently receives ALSO. In the Secretary of State's view, his disablement does not prevent him from following his regular service occupation of "Driver" and his award of ALSO is therefore to be withdrawn on 3 April 1996.

When your constituent telephoned the Agency and asked for a copy of the relevant legislation, this was taken as meaning he wanted a copy of the whole publication, ie the SPO. The War Pensions Agency is not able to supply copies of the SPO in its entirety as it is a priced item supplied by Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Our letter of 12 March 1996 told him that he could view a copy of the legislation at his local War Pensioners' Welfare Office. However, it is clear that a copy of the relevant two page extract from the legislation, ie Article 21, could have been copied and sent to him. I am sorry that this course of action was not immediately taken but I can confirm that these papers have now been sent to him.

Finally, you ask about the factors which led us to change the reference system used on payment books. The War Pensions Agency previously used two separate computer systems; one to support administration of a claim, the other to make payment. The two systems used different reference numbers. Since April 1995, the Agency has introduced a new computer system which supports the administration of claims through to payment. As part of that change the Agency, in accordance with the Department's long term strategy, introduced the use of the National Insurance number as the sole reference number. This change has affected all War Pensioners' records, on a rolling programme, not just of those in receipt of ALSO. The change to the use of national Insurance numbers does not affect War Pensions payments and is completely unconnected to the review of ALSO awards.

I hope you find this information useful.

Benefits Agency (Advice line)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the current budget for the Benefits Agency's freeline benefit advice line service; and what are the proposed budgets for the next two financial years; [23847]

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of the Benefits Agency's freeline benefit advice line; and if he will make a statement; [23848]

(3) how many Benefits Agency staff are employed to run the Benefits Agency's freeline benefit advice line. [23849]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ursula Brennan to Mr. Frank Field, dated 1 April 1996:

As Peter Mathison is on leave at the moment, the Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking what is the current budget for the Benefits Agency's (BA's) freeline benefit advice line service; and what are the proposed budgets for the next two financial years; if he will make a statement on the future of the BA's freeline benefit advice line; and how many Benefits Agency (BA) staff are employed to run the benefits Agency's freeline benefit advice line.

The budget for the BA Freeline Benefit Advice Line was £6.3 million for 1995/96 and the planned budget for 1996/97 is £6.6 million, which cover staff and running costs including telecomms costs. A review of the service provided is currently being undertaken. Until the results of the review are known I am unable to indicate what the proposed budgets might be for the following financial year.

The review will be looking at options for handling these types of enquiries within our overall benefit advice services.

The BA Freeline Benefit Advice Line has 192 full time and 77 part time staff in post as at 18 March 1996.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Social Fund

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 433, if he will list the reasons for refusal of the eight applicants who were not eligible for a social fund grant. [23845]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of the social fund is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ursula Brennan to Mr. Keith Bradley, dated 1 April 1996:

As Peter Mathison is on leave at the moment, the Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking pursuant to his Answer of 25th March, Official Report, column 433, if he will list the reasons for refusal of the eight applicants who were not eligible for a social fund grant.

Following Mr. Mathison's letter of 22 March 1996, I am now advised that one of the applicants was in fact awarded a Community Care Grant following their application. I apologise for this mistake.

The reason for refusal of the other seven applicants was that, in the opinion of the Social Fund Officer and based upon the individual circumstances pertaining to each application, Direction 4 (a) (i), (ii) and (iii) was not satisfied.

It may be helpful if I provide a explanation of the Direction which states:-

A Social Fund payment may be awarded to promote community care—

(a) by assisting an applicant with expenses, including expenses of travel within the United Kingdom (except those excluded by these directions) where such assistance will—

(i) help the applicant, a member of his family, or other person for whom the applicant (or a member of his family) will be providing care, to re-establish himself in the community following a stay in institutional or residential care; or

(ii) help the applicant, a member of his family or other person for whom the applicant (or a member of his family) will be providing care, to remain in the community rather than enter institutional or residential care; or

(iii) ease exceptional pressures on the applicant and his family.

Since the original decisions were made, one of the seven other applicants has requested a review of the decision not to award a Community Care Grant. A Social Fund Review Officer has reconsidered the original decision in the light of new information and has replaced the Budgeting Loan with a Community Care Grant award.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

HMSO

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what further information he plans to make available to Parliament at this stage of the privatisation of HMSO. [25219]

Mr. Freeman: An advertisement for the sale of HMSO appeared in the press on Tuesday 26 March. Potential bidders who satisfy the pre-qualification process will receive the information memorandum describing the business for sale shortly after Easter. The information memorandum has been written primarily to meet the requirements of these bidders. It contains commercially sensitive material and therefore, in order to protect the interests of the Crown, access to the information memorandum will be carefully controlled, with bidders signing a comprehensive confidentiality agreement.

However, in recognition of the unique role which HMSO plays by providing services which are essential to the smooth working of Parliament, I have already agreed that a copy of the information memorandum will be provided, on a confidential basis, to the Clerk of the Finance and Services Committee.

On further consideration of Parliament's particular interest in this privatisation, I have decided to arrange for an edited version of the information memorandum to be placed shortly in the Library of the House. This edited version will contain information relevant to the House's interest in the sale but will exclude commercially sensitive information.

LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24513]

Mr. Newton: My Department fully supports the Government's strategy set out in the White Paper, "Making Waste Work, a waste strategy for England and Wales". The adoption of a separate Privy Council Office waste minimisation strategy and target may not be appropriate, given the Department's small size and the fact that it is located within the Cabinet Office. Consideration will be given to this, however, in the coming months.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Television Receivers

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will commission a report on the technical and practical considerations of requiring all new television receivers to be fitted with a V-chip; and if she will make a statement. [22139]

Mr. Sproat: The Government are studying the technical and practical implications of the V-chip, and other similar devices. On 26 March the Department hosted a seminar organised by the Advertising Association at which Dr. Pober, executive director of the US Entertainment Software Rating Board, and Professor Goldstein, an expert in studies on violence and the media from Utrecht university, shared their knowledge of the experience to date in the USA.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what guidelines are currently in force in her Department and its executive agencies relating to competitive tendering and the use of single negotiated tenders; on what grounds single negotiated tenders can be used; and what procedures are in place within her Department to ensure that the use of single negotiated tenders in competitive tendering processes is justified in all cases. [22848]

Mr. Sproat: My Department and its executive agencies abide by the Government's public purchasing policy, published in the document "Public Purchasing Policy: Consolidated Guidelines". The policy states that goods and services are to be acquired by competition unless there are convincing reasons to the contrary. In addition, EC procurement directives and the World Trade Organisation government procurement agreement require most contracts above specified thresholds to be awarded following competition, subject to certain specified exceptions. The central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 40 provides an overview of best practice in the competitive tendering process.

To ensure that value for money is obtained, goods and services are subject to competitive tender wherever practicable. In exceptional circumstances, single tender action may be permissible where (i) there is no alternative source of supply, (ii) specialist knowledge or expertise exists with a particular supplier, (iii) there is an overriding urgency arising from circumstances outside the Department's control. Any case for single tender action must be approved at director or chief executive level in the agencies and head of division level in my Department.

My Department has a single tender delegation from HM Treasury of £25,000. Beyond this, my Department has no authority and must seek approval from HM Treasury.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by her Department and its executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if she will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by her Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22862]

Mr. Sproat: The total number and value of single tender contracts, with a value exceeding £500, awarded by my Department and its agencies in each of the last three years is shown in the table. In order to preserve commercial confidentiality, the information cannot be identified by value and individual contractor. In the majority of cases the reason for single tender has been due to (i) the specialist knowledge and expertise of the selected contractor, and (ii) overriding urgency arising from circumstances outside my Department's or its agencies' control. As can be seen from the table, the value of contracts let by single tender represents a small percentage of the total value of contracts let by my Department and its agencies.

	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96
Total number of contracts let by single tender	13	26	36
Total value of contracts let by single tender	£178,806	£401,200	£489,140
Single tender contracts expressed as a percentage of competitive contracts (by number)	8	8	9
Single tender contracts expressed as a percentage of competitive contracts (by value)	1.3	1.6	1.6

Sports Council (Information Technology Training)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when Sports Council staff will be fully trained in IT skills to handle administration of all programmes; and if she will make a statement about the training needs. [23086]

Mr. Sproat: These are matters for the members and senior management of the Sports Council, who have day-to-day responsibility for ensuring that the council operates as effectively and efficiently as possible with the resources at its disposal.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for her Department, indicating the targets set. [24503]

Mr. Sproat: Waste minimisation is a key aspect of my Department's existing green housekeeping strategy. We are planning to set targets for waste minimisation by the end of 1996.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to her Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24404]

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage is currently reviewing the necessity for any changes to computer systems to support the year 2000.

Children's Play

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when the new arrangements for children's play will commence. [25217]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: On 21 November 1995, Official Report, column 67, I announced that, subject to the successful completion of post-tender negotiations, the National Playing Fields Association would carry out work for my Department in the areas of playwork education and training, information dissemination and play safety. I am pleased to report that my Department has successfully completed post-tender negotiations with the association and that it will be carrying out work for my Department in these three areas from 1 May.

Public Libraries

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on contracting out in public libraries. [25218]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Following consultation with a wide range of interested parties on the report commissioned by my Department from KPMG on contracting out in the public library service, which was published following my previous written answer on 19 July 1995, Official Report, columns 1457–58, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales and I have decided for the present not to introduce competitive tendering in the public library service on a compulsory basis. However, we believe that the public library service should be encouraged to continue to improve its management and effectiveness by involving the private sector more. We intend to explore, over the coming months, how this can best be done and to set out our proposals in detail later in the year.

Lyric Theatre, Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what representations she has had concerning the adoption of a new lyric theatre for Wales as a successor scheme to the scheme for the Cardiff Bay opera house as a candidate for Millennium Commission funding; [22107]

(2) what consultations she has had with the chairman of the Millennium Commission on the involvement of Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber and Cameron Mackintosh and their companies in bidding jointly with the Cardiff Bay development corporation for millennium funding for a new lyric theatre for Wales in Cardiff bay. [22418]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answers 21 and 22 March 1996]: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I shall reply to the hon. Member in my capacity as chairman of the commission and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

TRANSPORT

Motorway Tolling

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many consortiums he now expects to take part in the motorway tolling trials; when contracts for the trials will be signed; and when he expects the trials to begin. [22764]

Mr. Watts: Negotiations with consortiums invited to participate in the motorway tolling trials are continuing.

Highways Agency Budget

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how the Highways Agency budget for 1996–97 is to be distributed between (a) regions and (b) individual schemes. [23082]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Sir Thomas Arnold, dated 3 April 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question about how the Highways Agency budget for 1996–97 is to be distributed between (a) regions and (b) individual schemes.

Information relating to planned 1996–97 expenditure was published in our Business Plan on 1 April. For the National Trunk Road Programme funds are not allocated to regions but to individual schemes. An allocation of £713 million has been made for expenditure on the attached list of National Schemes and on settlements for some completed schemes. Levels of expenditure on individual schemes will be determined by the speed at which works progress during the year.

London Underground

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will discuss with the chairman of London Transport the stopping of Piccadilly line trains at Turnham Green. [23437]

Mr. Norris: Yes. I shall raise the matter at my next regular meeting with the chairman of London Transport.

Central Railway plc

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has reached a decision on the application by Central Railway plc for directions under rule 12 of the Transport and Works (Applications and Objections Procedure) Rules granting waivers from compliance with certain application requirements in respect of the Central Railway project. [24954]

Mr. Watts: Yes. Having taken into account the views we have received from Members of Parliament, local planning authorities and others, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has decided to refuse Central Railway's applications for waiver directions under rule 12 of the Transport and Works (Applications and Objections Procedure) Rules, in so far as they relate to the provision of plans, sections and cross-sections of the works. Subject to further consideration of the scope of non-compliance, he is prepared to agree to partial waivers in respect of the serving of application documents on certain local planning authorities and other statutory bodies. He may also be prepared to waive full compliance with the rules relating to the placing of site notices, subject to being satisfied that persons affected would not be materially prejudiced by such a decision. My right hon. Friend's reasons for refusing waivers are set out in a letter sent today to Central Railway plc. Copies of the letter have been placed in the House of Commons Library and will be sent to all MPs with a constituency interest.

Newbury Bypass

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on the clearance work for the Newbury bypass. [25216]

Mr. Watts: The Highways Agency has completed the tree felling stage of the clearance work. A few trees remain on site, some of which harbour wildlife, which will not be disturbed until later in the year—in compliance with environmental legislation. Furthermore, some 85 per cent. of felled trees have been cleared from the site.

The sheriff has completed all necessary evictions of protesters from camps along the route.

Six tenders have been received for the main works contract and we expect to award the contract in the near future. Work will start towards the middle of the year with the aim of opening the bypass in the summer of 1998.

Crossrail

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the findings of the Montagu report on alternative funding of Crossrail before his further intentions for the future of the project are announced. [24280]

Mr. Norris: I have today placed the report in the Library, with the associated consultants' report on small-scale alternatives to Crossrail. I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave yesterday to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) on the next steps.

Crash Tests

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) on 22 March, Official Report, column 388, (1) what representations he has received from (a) consumer groups and (b) car manufacturers and their representatives about how best to present the test results; [24451]

(2) if a test can be repeated at the request of the manufacturer; [24453]

(3) if he will introduce legislation to require manufacturers to make the test results available to the public; [24455]

(4) if he will make it his policy to make the test results available to the public; [24456]

(5) if he will list the supermini cars currently involved in the testing programme; [24450]

(6) what consultations he has undertaken with (a) consumer groups and (b) car manufacturers and their representatives about how best to present the test results; [24452]

(7) what arrangements exist for car manufacturers to view the data before they are published. [24454]

Mr. Norris: I have not received representations from, nor consulted, industry or consumer groups on how best to present the test results, although I have had some representations from industry that any procedure should be fair.

There have been discussions with vehicle manufacturers at official level on the test procedure. Manufacturers of car models tested are invited to witness the tests and are shown the results. If there are doubts over the validity of a test, a repeat test might be arranged.

The car models in the current test programme are: Fiat Punto, Ford Fiesta, Nissan Micra, Renault Clio, Rover 100, Vauxhall Corsa and Volkswagen Polo. Their comparative performance will be identified in the report if the research findings show such comparisons to be meaningful and fair. It is the Department of Transport's responsibility to make the research results available to the public.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24498]

Mr. Norris: The Department's property managers are to prepare local action plans and targets to minimise waste.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24399]

Mr. Norris: The Department of Transport is participating in the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency initiative to address the issue and implications of the year 2000 for computers in the public sector.

European Driving Licence

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport at what stage it was agreed that the European driving licence should include 12 gold stars; if it was agreed by majority voting; what was the United Kingdom's position; if the United Kingdom Government may incorporate a Union Jack in the United Kingdom format; and what provision there is for drivers who wish to maintain a licence not incorporating gold stars. [24281]

Mr. Norris: I assume that my hon. Friend is referring to the proposed photocard licence, which will have the letters UK surrounded by the European logo of 12 stars. A common position on the draft directive providing for the photocard was adopted at the Transport Council on 7 to 8 December 1995, with United Kingdom support. The European logo makes licences easily recognisable throughout the EU and will be of assistance to the many drivers who drive abroad. There is no provision for driving licences to be issued in different formats, but we have no plans to call in current licences. There is scope for national symbols to be inserted on the photocard.

ENVIRONMENT

Cement Kiln Dust

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much cement kiln dust from the Clitheroe cement works went to agricultural or related uses in 1993 and in each subsequent year; and what were the particular agricultural or related uses to which the dust was put. [23536]

Mr. Clappison: No kiln dust from the Clitheroe cement works went to agricultural or related uses during the period from 1993 to date.

Fly-tipping

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make the enforcement of sections 33 and 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 a matter for local authorities with particular reference to control of fly-tipping. [24178]

Mr. Clappison: No authority is precluded from taking enforcement action under sections 33 or 34 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 where it has sufficient evidence to do so. However, the Environment Agency is a competent authority for the purposes of the amended EC framework directive on waste; the authority responsible for issuing waste management licences under section 35 of the 1990 Act; and the authority with which exemptions from licensing are registered. In the Department's view, therefore, the Environment Agency is the appropriate authority to take enforcement action where necessary under section 33 of the 1990 Act.

No authority has a specific duty to enforce the duty of care under section 34 of the 1990 Act. However, the effect of regulation 4 of the Environmental Protection (Duty of Care) Regulations 1991 is to require a person on whom the Environment Agency serves a notice to provide a copy of the written description of the waste and of the transfer note which those involved in the transfer of waste are required by regulation 3 to keep. The Department has no plans to amend regulation 4 of the 1991 regulations.

European Regional Development Fund

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has established the cause of the delay experienced by applicants for European regional development fund grants in the west midlands; and what measures he will take to promote greater efficiency in the handling of applications for the 1997–99 programmes. [24179]

Sir Paul Beresford: In the west midlands objective 2 programme, a competitive entry of over 800 initial applications lead to a lengthy short-listing process. The requirement to secure additional information on the 240 full applications subsequently received then resulted in the process overall taking longer than anticipated.

Greater efficiency in the handling of applications in the 1997–99 programme will be achieved by more rigorous selection of only high-quality projects at the initial stage for subsequent detailed appraisal.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24226]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department currently has no out-sourcing arrangements with the EDS computer system.

Green Belt Land (Waste Tipping)

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what powers he has to intervene in respect of local authority decisions not to refer to him decisions to tip large quantities of spoil on green belt land; [24249]

(2) what are the limits placed upon (a) the volume of waste which may be tipped on green belt land and (b) the period of time during which this may occur, if the ultimate use of the land is said to be for an appropriate use; and if he will make a statement. [24250]

(3) in what circumstances a local planning authority may authorise the tipping of waste on green belt land without the approval of the Secretary of State. [24252]

Sir Paul Beresford: Local authorities are required to determine on their individual merits planning applications for the tipping of waste on green belt land, its proposed after-use and the time scale involved by taking into account the provisions of the development plan and all other material considerations, including Government planning advice such as, in this case, planning policy guidance note 2: "Green Belts". The disposal of waste also requires a waste management licence from the Environment Agency.

Local authorities are required to notify the Secretary of State of any planning application which they do not intend to refuse and which will significantly prejudice the implementation of the development plan so that he can consider whether or not to call it in for his own determination. In addition, the Secretary of State has power to call in other applications, but in all instances he will do this only if in his view they give rise to planning issues of wider than local importance and then only if these issues warrant a decision by him rather than by the local authority.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his policy with regard to the tipping of waste on green belt land. [24251]

Sir Paul Beresford: The tipping of waste on green belt land is inappropriate development unless it maintains openness and does not conflict with the purposes of including land in the green belt. Further advice is given in paragraphs 1.5 and 3.12 of planning policy guidance note 2, "Green Belts".

Metal Recyclers

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has undertaken (a) a cost compliance assessment and (b) a small business litmus test of the proposals outlined in waste management planning as they apply to metal recyclers. [24462]

Mr. Clappison: My Department prepares compliance cost assessments in accordance with general Government guidelines, and they include a small business litmus test. The guidelines require a compliance cost assessment to be prepared for proposed legislation or when preparing statistical surveys which will involve business. "Waste management planning—principles and practice" sets out the way in which waste regulation authorities—now the Environment Agency—should collect information on wastes and waste management facilities and use it to promote integrated waste strategies, leading to more sustainable waste management. It gives non-statutory guidance on the way surveys should be carried out, but does not constitute the preparation of a survey. Accordingly, no compliance cost assessment was deemed to be necessary for this document.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce his capping principles for 1996–97 and the list of authorities which he intends to designate. [24785]

Mr. Gummer: My capping principles for 1996–97 are as follows:

(i) Unitary authorities and county councils will be able to increase their budget requirement by 3 per cent. or the increase in their education, personal social services and fire standard spending assessments, whichever is the greater.

(ii) Metropolitan districts outer London boroughs and fire and civil defence authorities, including London, will be able to increase their budget requirement by 2 per cent. or the increase in their education, PSS and/or fire SSAs, as appropriate, whichever is the greater.

(iii) Inner London boroughs will be able to increase their budget requirement by 1.5 per cent. or the increase in their education, PSS and fire SSAs, whichever is the greater.

(iv) Shire districts will be able to increase their budget requirement by 0.5 per cent.

(v) Police authorities will be able to increase their budget requirement by 3.5 per cent. or the increase in their police SSA, whichever is the greater.

Authorities budgeting more than 12.5 per cent. above SSA are subject to a cash freeze.

There is a general proviso that no authority is to be designated if its budget requirement is £10,000 or less above the limit implied by these principles.

In accordance with sections 54 and 56 of the Local Government Finance Act 1992, I have decided to designate the following authorities. The amount given after each authority is the amount which I am proposing should be the maximum amount calculated by each authority as its budget requirement for 1996–97.

	£ Million
Cambridgeshire County Council	402.590
Oxfordshire County Council	332.024
Essex County Council	974.218
Merseyside Fire and Civil Defence Authority	52.780
Greater Manchester Fire and Civil Defence Authority	76.958
Tyne and Wear Fire and Civil Defence Authority	37.444

Authorities which have been designated for council tax capping now have 28 days, starting today, in which to inform us whether or not they accept their proposed cap. Essex county council, Tyne and Wear fire and civil defence authority, Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority and Merseyside fire and civil defence authority have been designated at the budgets they originally set and therefore do not have to reduce their budgets nor incur rebilling costs.

Oxfordshire and Cambridgeshire have been designated at a lower level than they proposed. If they accept, the cap is confirmed by notice and the authorities can set a revised lower budget and lower council tax bills forthwith. If they challenge, they must propose an alternative amount together with their reasons for doing so. At this stage, authorities have the opportunity to meet us to explain their case. Once we have considered all the available information, we shall propose final caps which will be included in an order, a draft of which is debated by the House of Commons. If the draft order is approved, final caps are set by notice and revised budgets and council tax levels must then be set by the authorities concerned.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24409]

Sir Paul Beresford: We understand, on advice from the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency, that this problem is largely confined to old computer systems. The Department's computer systems are primarily based on more modern technology and any older systems which remain are expected to be replaced before 2000.

Director General of Water Services

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what decision he has taken on the appointment of the Director General of Water Services from 30 June 1996. [25123]

Mr. Gummer: The Secretary of State for Wales and I have decided to reappoint Mr. Byatt until 31 July 2000. This will enable him to carry out and complete the implementation of the outcome of a further periodic review of water charge limits to apply from 1 April 2000.

Single Regeneration Budget

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the indicative allocations to Government offices for the regions in respect of round 3 of the single regeneration budget challenge fund. [25124]

Mr. Curry: The indicative regional allocations for the first two years of round 3 of the challenge fund are shown, expressed in terms of bands.

These figures relate to the current total provision for round 3 of £200 million for 1997–98 and 1998–99, with £50 million of this available in 1997–98. The funding available to each region for new schemes also reflects commitments arising from earlier bidding rounds. The sums available to support approved round 3 schemes in later years are subject to annual public expenditure decisions. The final allocations will depend upon Ministers' decisions on the bids submitted for support in response to the bidding guidance, copies of which are in the Library of the House. Final bids are due to be submitted by 23 September 1996.

	£ million
London	64–70

Eastern	2–5
South West	6–8
East Midlands	5–8
West Midlands	9–12
Merseyside	7–10

	£ million
North West	24–28
Yorks and Humberside	20–24
North East	30–34

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what exemptions from the requirements of compulsory competitive tendering will be granted to local authorities affected by structure and boundary changes which have been announced but not yet confirmed by orders following the district structure reviews. [25125]

Sir Paul Beresford: We intend that the exemptions already granted to authorities affected by structure and boundary changes which have been announced but not yet confirmed by orders following the county structure review will be extended to those similarly affected by the outcome of the district reviews. This means that, for existing blue collar services, the requirements of CCT will be suspended from the date of the order until 18 months after the reorganisation date—or up to 24 months in the case of housing management.

So far as white collar CCT services are concerned, an implementation timetable is already specified for authorities being reorganised, but no timetable is laid down for authorities that might be reorganised from 1 April 1998. Local authorities reorganised from 1 April 1998 will be allowed the same periods for implementation of white collar CCT as those already laid down for authorities being reorganised from earlier specified dates.

Sulphur Protocol

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he plans to publish proposals for ensuring that the United Kingdom meets its commitments under the second UN Economic Commission for Europe sulphur protocol. [25126]

Mr. Clappison: Under the terms of the second UNECE sulphur protocol, the United Kingdom is committed, among other things, to reducing national emissions of sulphur dioxide by 80 per cent. by 2010 compared with 1980 levels. We are developing a national strategy for meeting these commitments. The strategy will go beyond the existing national plan, which gives effect in the United Kingdom to the requirements of the EC large combustion plant directive in looking at all sources of emissions.

In developing the strategy, we are now reviewing the operation of the national plan to see whether it will still be appropriate in its current form, in the context of the strategy and in the light of the substantial reductions which have been achieved, and those which are now forecast, in the level of emissions from large combustion plant.

We hope to publish a consultation document on our proposals shortly.

Correspondence

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Hammersmith to the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison), of 8 December 1995 concerning same-sex relationships and housing policy. [20491]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 12 March 1996]: I wrote to the hon. Member for Hammersmith today.

Abattoir Waste

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of abattoir waste volume which enters United Kingdom sewerage systems annually; and if he will make a statement on the adequacy of water treatment works when dealing with potential bovine spongiform encephalopathy contaminated material. [23221]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 1 April 1996]: Information for England and Wales provided by the sewerage undertakers shows that there are approximately 200 abattoirs with trade effluent consents. The annual volume of abattoir effluent entering the sewerage system is unavailable. Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

The adequacy of standard forms of sewage treatment on potential BSE-contaminated material is unknown. All animals exhibiting clinical symptoms of BSE are killed and incinerated. The specified bovine offals, which include all the tissues known to harbour BSE infectivity, are removed from cattle at slaughter and destroyed. As a result, it is unlikely that any BSE-contaminated material could enter the sewerage system.

Yorkshire Water

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library the inventory of Yorkshire Water reservoirs, treatment works and other water storage assets operational at the point of privatisation. [24204]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 2 April 1996]: This information is contained in pages 562 to 570 of the "Prospectus for the Water Share Offers", which was issued in November 1989. A copy is in the Library.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

R v. Burt and Adams Ltd.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Attorney-General what has been the expense to public funds of the case of R v. Burt and Adams Ltd. on the trading-up of non-monetary prizes from amusement machines; and what is the expected cost of the proposed appeal to the House of Lords if that appeal should fail. [23291]

The Attorney-General: The judicial and court costs for the Crown Court and the Court of Appeal totalled approximately £2,593. The prosecution costs in those proceedings were £12,707.29. This does not include those costs attributable to Crown Prosecution Service staff who worked on the case as part of their ordinary duties. It is not possible to give an estimate of the overall costs of the appeal to the House of Lords.

Executive Agencies

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Attorney-General what further progress he has made towards establishing executive agencies in his Department under the Government's next steps initiative; and if he will make a statement. [25162]

The Attorney-General: On 15 March 1995, I informed the House, Official Report columns 580–81, that the Treasury Solicitor's Department had been selected as a candidate for executive agency status. I am pleased to announce that I established the Treasury Solicitor's Department as an executive agency on 1 April. The chief executive will have clear responsibilities for improvements in efficiency, effectiveness and quality of service. These responsibilities are to be set out in the agency's framework document, which will be published and copies placed in the Library. Targets are set out in the agency's corporate and business plans. An annual report and accounts will be produced and copies also put in the Library.

The agency has 390 staff based in London. It will continue to provide legal services to Government Departments and other publicly funded bodies, but on a more commercial basis. It will continue to compete, where appropriate, with private firms of solicitors. The establishment of the Treasury Solicitor's Department as an executive agency will provide the appropriate structure and discipline to enhance its ability to supply a more efficient, economic and effective delivery of legal services to its clients. I have appointed Mr. Michael Saunders, the present Treasury Solicitor, to be the agency's first chief executive.

The key performance targets are as follows: to achieve efficiency savings of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum; to recover the full operating cost for chargeable services of the agency; to achieve 90 per cent. customer satisfaction in advisory services; to achieve $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. reductions in the average unit cost per chargeable hour or per case as appropriate.

I wish the chief executive and his staff every success for the future.

WALES

Regional or Minority Languages

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans the Government have to sign the Council for Europe charter on regional or minority languages. [25128]

Mr. Hague: The Government have given thorough consideration to the merits of signing this charter. We believe that, in the United Kingdom's case, the Government are better placed to assess the needs of, and determine the level of support for, indigenous minority languages. For this reason, we have decided not to sign.

Purchase Grant Scheme

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he plans to consult on his proposals to exempt rural communities from the purchase grant scheme; and if he will make a statement. [25129]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We have today issued a consultation paper asking for comments from local authorities, housing associations and other interested parties on our proposals for exempting rural communities from the new purchase grant scheme.

As is made clear in the recent White Paper, "A Working Countryside for Wales", we recognise the particular difficulty in building or finding replacement properties for rent in rural areas, and the planned statutory scheme for future publicly funded developments will not therefore apply to rural communities across Wales which have a population density of less than 150 persons per sq km. This will help ensure the availability of affordable housing for rent in rural Wales where this issue is of special concern.

The Housing Bill currently before Parliament would give my right hon. Friend the power to designate by order rural areas where the new right would not arise. In the case of the voluntary scheme, the statutory list of exempted areas will be available for associations to use.

The consultation paper sets out the way we propose to implement this designation and invites comments on the methodology and on the list of areas we plan to exempt. Copies have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin 1996

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much funding will be allocated to Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin 1996 by his Department; and if he will make a statement. [23179]

Mr. Richards: For 1996–97, the Welsh Office has allocated total funding of £689,872 to Mudiad Ysgolion Meithrin comprising £537,000 under section 26 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976 and £152,872 under the support for child and family services grant scheme.

Schools (Examination Statistics)

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by rank order the A-level examination results for each Welsh education authority and show beside each result, together with the education authority's rank order for each statistic, (a) the GCSE result, (b) the average number of pupils in each primary class in that authority, (c) the average number of pupils in each secondary class in that authority, (d) the cost per primary pupil place, (e) the cost per secondary pupil place, (f) the primary school pupil-teacher ratio and (g) the secondary school pupil-teacher ratio. [23665]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is contained in the following table.

Within the table the columns numbered 1,2,3,4,7 and 8 are in respect of local education authority maintained and grant-maintained schools, while columns 5 and 6 are in respect of LEA maintained schools only.

School Buildings

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what guidance he has given to the unitary authorities concerning sub-standard school buildings. [23533]

Mr. Richards: The condition of school buildings is the responsibility of local education authorities.

Health Services in Rural Areas

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he is taking to extend the provision of health services closer to patients in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [23525]

Mr. Richards: One of the commitments made in "Caring for the Future"—the NHS Wales plan for improving quality—is to increase safe and effective care closer to people's homes. I would expect health authorities, GP fundholders and NHS trusts to take this into account when determining what health services are provided to patients in rural areas.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales in what circumstances doctors are permitted to dispense prescriptions to patients living in rural areas; and if he will make a statement. [23524]

Mr. Richards: Doctors may be permitted to dispense drugs and appliances to patients who satisfy their health authority that they reside in a controlled locality more than one mile from the nearest pharmacy, or would for other reasons have serious difficulty in reaching a pharmacy.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many assisted school places there are currently; and what sums were received by each school in the scheme in the latest school year. [23534]

Mr. Richards: There are some 720 assisted school places in Wales. The total amount of central Government funds received by each of the schools in the scheme for the academic year 1994–95 is as follows:

Academic year 1994–95

Schools	Total received by schools £
Christ College, Brecon	411,648
Howell's Cardiff	441,926
Howell's Denbigh	369,460

Council House Sales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the amounts (a) realised and (b) held by each local authority from council house sales receipts since council house sales were introduced; and if he will make a statement. [23751]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The available information is given the following table:

Fishing

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will increase the resources of the Welsh Agriculture Department for the provision of a mechanism to meet the needs of fishing; and if he will make a statement. [23797]

Mr. Richards: I am satisfied that the resources of the Welsh Office Agriculture Department are sufficient to meet the needs of fishing in Wales.

Sea Fisheries Committee

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will establish an all-Wales sea fisheries committee; and if he will make a statement. [23798]

Mr. Richards: Sea Fisheries Committees are set up under the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act 1966 at the request of their constituent local authorities. This is therefore a matter for the local authorities or the SFCs themselves.

Sea Empress Oil Spill

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are the criteria for lifting the ban imposed on fishing in the designated area affected by the Sea Empress oil spill. [23799]

Mr. Richards: The safety of consumers is paramount and the current restrictions will be lifted only when health and fisheries scientists advise that fish from the area are once again safe to eat.

There are no statutory limits on the amount of oil in fish or shellfish which is deemed safe and I am advised that it is not possible to set limits for all the possible constituents of oil. Therefore, in deciding when and where sections of the fishing industry will be allowed to operate again in the restricted area, our considerations will be on the basis of data on normal background concentrations for areas subsequently affected by the spill and such data from elsewhere around the UK. That is, we will consider whether levels are significantly higher than normal background levels.

Fish and shellfish from elsewhere around the coast of Wales and the UK remain safe to eat.

Forestry

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the number of trees planted by the forestry industry within each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [23822]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of trees planted each year in Wales has increased from about 6.5 million to about 7 million over the last five years.

Cardiff University Hospital

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the recent release by Cardiff University hospital from its mortuary of one body in mistake for another. [24488]

Mr. Richards: The circumstances leading to this regrettable incident are being investigated by the University Hospital of Wales NHS trust and the coroner's office. The trust will examine whether proper procedures were adhered to and implement any necessary improvements to current systems.

Welsh Office officials will be kept informed to determine whether lessons learnt should be disseminated more widely.

Assaults on Teachers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many cases of pupils assaulting teachers were reported in Wales in (a) 1975, (b) 1985 and (c) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [24603]

Mr. Richards: This information is not available centrally.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Office, indicating the targets set. [24502]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Waste reduction is already an important feature of the Department's strategy for improving green standards internally and a range of targets are in place for reducing the amount of office waste the Welsh Office sends to landfill. These are the recycling of 37 tonnes of waste paper, 16,000 cans and 600 printer toner cartridges each year.

The Welsh Office will also review its current practices, particularly in the light of a recent pilot study of waste management carried out by the Department of the Environment, to see if existing performance can be further improved upon.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24397]

Mr. Hague: I do not expect there to be any difficulties in ensuring that my Department's computer systems can cater for the year 2000.

Rail Freight Terminal, South Wales

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to receive recommendations from the Welsh Development Agency relating to the location of a rail freight terminal in south Wales. [25130]

Mr. Hague: I have today agreed with the Welsh development agency that it should enter into further discussions with the promoters of the proposal for a rail freight terminal at Wentloog near Cardiff.

The WDA board sought my agreement after its meeting on Friday at which it considered a consultant's report on the two proposals then before it. The board has concluded that the Wentloog site offers the better prospect but that further discussions with the promoters are necessary to determine whether, and if so to what extent, it might wish to offer assistance. It will also be looking for substantial and firmly committed private sector funding.

Public Bodies

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to paragraph 1.29 of his departmental report for 1996, what were the outturn figures for 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95; and what were the outturn figures for expenditure on publicity by executive non-departmental public bodies in each of the past five years. [23560]

Mr. Gwilym Jones [holding answer 1 April 1996]: Paragraph 1.29 of the Welsh Office departmental report for 1996 provides details of forecast outturn expenditure for 1995–96 on publicity by the Department and forecast spend by non-departmental public bodies in 1996–97.

Publicity expenditure by the Welsh Office for the years 1992–93 to 1994–95 is as follows:

1992–93: £1,974,000

1993–94: £1,358,000

1994–95: £1,725,000

Publicity expenditure by public bodies is as follows:

1994–95: £17,197,000 outturn

1995–96: £17,662,000 forecast outturn

Figures for the two years include for a number of public bodies, their total marketing budget and reflect for others all expenditure on publications; exhibitions and soon in pursuance of their statutory functions. Information is provided for 1994–95 and 1995–96 only; comparable figures for earlier years are not available.

Abortion Facilities, North Wales

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the reasons for the withdrawal of local termination of pregnancy facilities within the NHS in north Wales. [23561]

Mr. Richards [holding answer 2 April 1996]: The responsibility for the commissioning of abortion services in north Wales rests with the North Wales health authority. It is for individual health authorities to assess the health care needs of their local population and to decide priorities within their overall resources.

General Medical Practitioners

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the whole-time equivalent number of NHS general medical practitioners working in each family health service association area in Wales at the latest date for which figures are available. [24384]

Mr. Richards [holding answer 2 April 1996]: The information, which relates to 1 April 1995, is given in the following table.

	Whole-time equivalent number of general medical practitioners[1]
Clwyd	221
Dyfed	212
Gwent	233
Gwynedd	156

PRIME MINISTER

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what savings to date have been made by the Cabinet Office as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24237]

The Prime Minister: For these purposes, my office is part of the Cabinet Office. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, on 2 April, Official Report, column 85.

Danish Tour Guide (Manslaughter)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister what letters of condolence have been sent by the British Government to the family of the Danish tour guide for whose manslaughter three British service personnel have been convicted; when they were sent; and which Government Minister sent them. [24564]

The Prime Minister: I understand that the then commanding officer, British Forces Cyprus, sent a letter of condolence to the family.

Conduct of Government Business

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Prime Minister what advice has been furnished to Government Departments on the conduct of Government business during the period prior to local and European elections. [24545]

The Prime Minister: The Cabinet Office is circulating to Departments today the normal guidance to civil servants on the principles which they should observe in relation to the conduct of Government business during the period prior to local and European elections. It is as follows:

Local and European elections

1. Local and European Election campaigns differ from general elections in that there is no prospect of a change of government consequent upon the elections, and the business of government continues as usual. However, there is an increasing tendency by all political parties to approach local and European elections from a national point of view, with nationally produced material. Officials of all departments should therefore take especial care during the period of local or European election campaigns not to undertake any activity which could call into question their political impartiality, or could give rise to the criticism that public resources are being used for party political purposes. Particular care should be exercised in relation to the announcement of sensitive decisions with a local or European dimension, and in relation to paid publicity campaigns.

2. The following general principles should be observed:

(a) there should be even-handedness in meeting information requests from candidates from different political parties. Such requests and responses should be channelled through the appropriate Minister's private office and handled in accordance with the principles laid down in the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information;

(b) special advisers should if necessary be reminded of the rules against circulating material on party paper within departments;

(c) particular care should be taken over official action and the use of public resources, including publicity, surrounding and supporting Ministerial announcements which have a bearing on local or European matters;

(d) similar care should be taken over announcements of decisions made at official level. In some cases it may be better to defer an announcement until after the election but this would need to be balanced carefully against any implication that deferral could itself influence the political outcome; each case should be considered on its merits; and

(e) special care should be taken in respect of paid publicity campaigns, particularly new campaigns, which should not be open to the criticism that they are being undertaken for party political purposes.

3. The period of sensitivity preceding local or European elections is not fixed in relation to any particular date, but for the purposes of this guidance, the general convention is that particular care should be taken in the three weeks prior to polling day.

European Court of Justice

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will raise at the next European Council the operation of the European Court of Justice. [22342]

The Prime Minister: The Turin Council of 29 March agreed an agenda for the intergovernmental conference including the operation of the European Court of Justice.

TREASURY

Beef Stocks

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the Inland Revenue will treat, for tax purposes, stocks of beef held by butchers ready for sale whose value has been eroded by the collapse of the beef market. [23769]

Mr. Jack: The same rules on trading stock will apply to butchers as to other traders.

An accountant will draw up a traders' accounts using the normal accounting conventions. These conventions recognise trading stock losses and deal with them appropriately in the accounts. Tax treatment follows these conventions and allows for the profits and losses of trading stock when working out the taxable income. Butchers' stock losses will be treated in the same way as the stock losses of any other trader.

Earnings

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage of workers on adult rates of pay in part-time employment whose hourly earnings (a) including and (b) excluding overtime pay are less than (i) £4.26 per hour, (ii) £5.68 per hour, (iii) £6.03 per hour and (iv) average weekly earnings in (x) Great Britain, (y) Scotland and (z) the regions of Scotland broken down by (1) male manual, (2) male non-manual, (3) all male workers, (4) female manual, (5) female non-manual, (6) all female workers, (7) all manual, (8) all non-manual and (9) all workers. [22058]

EU Contributions

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the gross contribution to be made to the European Union in the calendar year 1996 and the appropriate net contribution; and if he will publish a table showing these figures for the previous four years. [24068]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's forecast of the United Kingdom's gross and net contribution to the European Community in 1996 will shortly be published in the annual White Paper, "Statement on the Community Budget". Outturn figures for the years 1992 to 1995 are set out in the table:

£ million

Year	Gross contributions before abatement	Abatement	Gross contributions after abatement	Public sector receipts	Net contribution after abatement and public sector receipts
1992	6,738	–1,881	4,857	–2,827	2,030
1993	7,985	–2,539	5,446	–3,291	2,155
1994	7,189	–1,726	5,463	–3,253	2,211
1995	8,889	–1,207	7,682	–3,522	4,160

Income Tax

Mr. Forman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 14 March, Official Report, column 688, what is his estimate of the average rate of income tax in 1996–97 for (a) a two-earner married couple with no children and (b) a two-earner married couple with two children under 11 years of age, if the households concerned are on (i) half average household income, (ii) average household income and (iii) twice average household income. [24105]

Mr. Jack: Standard comparisons are based on calculating income tax liabilities with incomes at multiples of full-time male average earnings and full-time female average earnings—adult rates, all occupations. Estimates for 1996–97 are given in the table.

Income tax as a percentage of earnings

	Multiple of average earnings[1]
	0.5	1	2
Two-earner married couple with no children	10.6	17.3	23.5
Two-earner married couple with two children under 11[2]	4.9	14.4	22.0

[1] Full-time males plus full-time females on adult rates, all occupations.

[2] Net of child benefit.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage of their population paying the higher rate of income tax for each regional council area and district council area in Scotland. [23796]

Mr. Jack: Information derived from the survey of personal incomes for the larger Scottish regions in 1993–94 is shown in the table. I regret that reliable estimates are not available for the smaller regions or district council areas.

	Number of higher rate taxpayers in 1993–94 expressed as a percentage of people aged 16 years or over
Scotland	3.0
Central	3.0
Fife	2.0
Grampian	4.8
Highlands	2.8
Lothian	3.9
Strathclyde	2.5
Tayside	2.8

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the total sum contributed by employers to occupational pensions on behalf of employees in the last year for which figures are available; [23978]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of (a) higher rate taxpayers, (b) basic rate taxpayers and (c) lower rate taxpayers who benefit from employers' contributions to occupational pension schemes; [23976]

(3) how much of the tax relief on employers' occupational pension contributions is attributable to (a) higher rate taxpayers, (b) basic rate taxpayers and (c) lower rate taxpayers; [23979]

(4) what is the estimated average rate of tax relief on employers' contributions to occupational pension schemes. [23977]

Mr. Jack: The latest estimate, which is still provisional, is that total employers' contributions to occupational pensions 1994–95 were about £10,300 million. Information is not available to enable employers' contributions to be related to particular individuals. The revenue cost of not treating employers' contributions as a taxable benefit in kind of the employees is based on an average marginal tax rate of about 28 per cent., giving a cost of tax relief of around £2,900 million. This assumes that the distribution of marginal tax rate is similar to that of employees generally, but it would be misleading to provide the more detailed information requested on the basis of very general assumptions.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of employees in pensionable employment whose pension entitlement is not at present covered by the earnings ceiling. [23980]

Mr. Jack: The information is not available centrally. Only the trustees of individual occupational schemes would be able to provide this information.

Unemployment Statistics

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the number of unemployed persons in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Wales, aged under 25 years; how many have never attained full-time employment; how many have a higher education qualification; and if he will make a statement. [23800]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information available from the labour force survey for autumn—September to November—1995 is shown in the table. It is not seasonally adjusted.

	United Kingdom	Wales
International Labour Organisation unemployed aged under 25	737,000	35,000
Of which: Have a higher education qualification[1]	80,000	[2]—
Never had a paid job	295,000	12,000
of which: in full-time education	106,000	[2]—

[1] Qualification above A-level or equivalent.
[2] Estimate below 10,000 not shown.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24235]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury currently has no out-sourcing arrangements with the EDS computer system.

Budget (Women)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will ask his Department to conduct a separate analysis of the impact the measures in this year's Budget will have on women in advance of his autumn Budget statement; [22726]

(2) what assessment his Department made in advance of the autumn Budget statement of the impact which the measures in last year's Budget would have on women. [22727]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The impact of the Budget on all groups is considered very carefully.

VAT (Sanitary Products)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the estimated revenue generated from value added tax on sanitary products for women in each of the last four years; and what would be the estimated annual cost to the Treasury of reducing value added tax on sanitary products to the lowest permissible level. [22762]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: No actual figures are available on the revenue generated from value added tax on sanitary products for women; however, it is estimated to be of the order of £40 million annually. The estimated annual cost to the Treasury of reducing value added tax on sanitary products to 5 per cent. the lowest permissible level, is approximately £25 million.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consideration his Department has given to reducing value added tax on sanitary products to a lower rate. [22763]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Since the last Labour Government agreed with other EU member states in 1977 that the UK would not extend the scope of its existing zero rates, it is not possible to zero-rate these products. Member states may apply to them a reduced rate of not less than 5 per cent., but it remains Government policy not to have a reduced rate for anything except domestic fuel and power in the interests of having as simple a rate structure for the tax as possible.

Unfunded Pension Liabilities

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the dissemination of information among member states' Ministers and senior officials relating to unfunded pension liabilities and other member state unfunded liabilities in connection with a single European currency. [22624]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Measuring future pensions and other liabilities on a comparable basis for different countries is not straightforward, but studies have been undertaken by the OECD and others and widely disseminated. These suggest that, compared with other member states, the UK is in a relatively favourable position in this area.

VAT and Excise Office, Hammersmith

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many customers have attended in person to pay VAT and related taxes on the last date for payment in each of the last 12 months at Griffin house VAT and excise office, Hammersmith. [23659]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: One hundred and twenty-eight customers have attended in person to pay taxes on the last date for payment during the year to February 1996. The number of customers attending in each month are:

	Number
31 March 1995	23
28 April 1995	8
31 May 1995	4
30 June 1995	4
31 July 1995	15
31 August 1995	18
29 September 1995	14
31 October 1995	3
30 November 1995	3
29 December 1995	10
31 January 1996	9
29 February 1996	17
	128

In addition, 571 envelopes were deposited for onward transmission to the Department's accounting centre in Southend, and it is fair to assume that a significant proportion of these would have included payments.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24398]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury is aware of the problem and has already taken action. It will take into account forthcoming guidance to be issued by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency in April and, in parallel, it is investigating the scale and complexity of the problem as it affects its own information technology systems. We will proceed on the basis of the results of this exercise.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24509]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury supports fully the Government statement in the White Paper, "Making Waste Work, A strategy for sustainable waste management in England and Wales". We aim to set targets by the end of 1996.

Manufactured Goods

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on trends in the balance of trade in manufactures since 1992. [24827]

Mrs. Angela Knight: There has been no obvious trend in the balance of trade in manufacturers since 1992, although the volume of exports has increased faster than the volume of imports.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made towards agreeing private finance initiative projects in 1995–96; what steps he is taking to increase the number of private finance initiative contracts; and if he will make a statement. [25127]

Mr. Jack: The private finance initiative is now making a serious contribution to the delivery of services to the public. Within 12 months, the Government have agreed projects with a capital value of £4.8 billion. In addition, projects with a capital value of around £300 million are at preferred bidder stage. A further £330 million worth is expected to be agreed shortly. These are listed in the tables.

These figures tell only part of the story. The total value of a PFI deal to the private sector can typically be three times the capital value because the Government contract to buy services associated with an asset for years to come.

Through PFI, the Government have achieved more than many people ever thought possible, though agreeing this number of deals has not been without problems. I have published new procurement guidelines today which will be circulated throughout the public sector. They are a practical response to comments made by people active in PFI and are designed to help smooth out processes, reduce bidding costs and speed up the flow of good deals. I have placed a copy in the Library.

PFI offers prospects for the public and private sectors to work in partnership throughout the country. I am about to embark on a tour to promote PFI regionally and to hear directly from people active on PFI contracts.

From this solid base, the Government intend to go on to agree at least £14 billion worth of deals by the end of 1998–99. The PFI is unlocking new resources, producing a new range of investment opportunities and increasingly replacing more old-style public sector capital spending and service procurement.

Defence Estimates

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to publish the 1996 statement on the defence estimates; and if he will ensure that the 1996 edition of "Defence Statistics" will be published concurrently. [23442]

Mr. Soames: On current plans, the statement on the defence estimates 1996 should be published and laid in the House on 1 May 1996. As last year, we expect to publish the 1996 edition of "Defence Statistics" in mid-July, the earliest feasible date, allowing for compilation and validation of information relating to the end of the financial year.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what out-sourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23739]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, the Hydrographic Office and the Meteorological Office under their framework documents. I have asked the chief executives to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence for details about out-sourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system. I am replying on behalf of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA).

I have assumed that the question refers only to computer software systems and I have based my answer on this. DERA does not have any such contracts with EDS.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from J. P. Clarke to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

1. You recently asked the Secretary of State for Defence two Parliamentary Questions relating to out-sourcing contracts with EDS software computer systems. As your questions relate, in part to the Hydrographic Office and such issues fall within my responsibility as Chief Executive of the Hydrographic Office, I have been asked to reply to you.

2. I have assumed you would not object if I were to answer both of your questions in this letter and on that basis I can advise you that the Hydrographic Office has no out-sourcing contract with EDS. Furthermore the Hydrographic Office has never had any out-sourcing arrangement with EDS and, as a consequence, no savings can be reported.

3, I hope this information has been helpful.

Letter from J. C. R. Hunt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Meterological Office I am replying to your recent questions to the Defence Secretary concerning out-sourcing contracts with EDS.

We currently have no such contracts.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the savings to date to his Department and his Department's agencies from out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS software computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24360]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This information is not held centrally for my Department and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The matters fall also, however, to the chief executives of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, the Hydrographic Office and the Meteorological Office under their framework documents. I have asked the chief executives of those agencies to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

You asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the savings to-date to his Department and his Department's agencies from out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS software computer system compared with the use of in-house services. I am replying on behalf of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA).

I have assumed that the question refers only to computer software systems and I have based my answer on this. DERA does not have any such contracts with EDS.

I hope this is helpful.

We currently have no such contracts.

Helicopters

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the ratio of support and maintenance technicians for helicopters in support of the Army between those operated by the Royal Air Force and the Army air corps. [24130]

Mr. Soames: The Army air corps has an aircraft establishment of 260 helicopters, with 43 reserves. These receive first and second-line technical support from 1,022 aircraft engineering officers and men, and 293 contractors' personnel. The Royal Air Force has an aircraft establishment of 138 support helicopters, with 35 reserves. These are supported by 1,708 aircraft engineers, and 230 contractors' personnel. Third-line support of these helicopters is provided under tri-service arrangements. It would be misleading to draw a direct comparison between these two sets of figures. The technical complexity of the helicopters involved is very different, as are the levels of maintenance carried out at the second line by the two services.

Cyprus (Discipline)

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many violent incidents were recorded by the British Army in Cyprus which occurred off base and involved the civilian population in each of the last five years. [24076]

Mr. Soames: Until recently, this information has not been held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. For the period 1 January 1995 to 1 January 1996, there were 16 cases of grievous bodily harm involving members of the British Army in Cyprus. Of these, seven were between soldiers, seven were attacks on soldiers by civilians, and two were attacks on civilians by soldiers.

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the legal costs so far for the defence of riflemen of the Royal Green Jackets for all the charges relating to the attack and killing of Louise Jensen on Cyprus in 1994 for (a) the pre-trial stage of the proceedings taken against them by the authorities in Cyprus and (b) the trial. [24132]

Mr. Soames: The bills presented for legal aid have not differentiated between pre-trial and trial costs. Bills presented to 31 December 1995 have amounted to £170,000. We estimate that additional bills to date yet to be presented will add a further £30,000 approximately.

RAF Bentwaters

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to ensure the integration into the local economy of the development of the vacant site at RAF Bentwaters; and if he will make a statement. [24372]

Mr. Soames: Over a period of two years, my Department has liaised extensively with the local authorities, Suffolk county council, and Suffolk Coastal district council and the Department of the Environment to agree a planning brief for this site. That brief has now been adopted in the structure and local plans, and will form the basis on which detailed planning applications from the purchaser are determined.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the bids received for the recently vacated site of RAF Brentwaters; and if he will make a statement. [24373]

Mr. Soames: It is not our practice to disclose the bids received for surplus property as this information is commercially confidential.

RAF Woodbridge

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will list the bids received for the recently vacated site of RAF Woodbridge; and if he will make a statement; [24375]

(2) what plans he has to ensure the integration into the local economy of the development of the vacant site at RAF Woodbridge; and if he will make a statement. [24374]

Mr. Soames: RAF Woodbridge was taken into the Army estate on a phased basis between 1993 and 1995. It is currently being used for training and as accommodation. The only vacant site at Woodbridge barracks is the former USAF technical site, no bids for which have been invited. Its future use is being considered by a firm of civilian consultants. The opinions, views and concerns of the local authorities and communities will be taken into consideration before any decisions are made.

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will ensure that the research conducted by Dr. Howard Urnovitz into the effects of oral polio vaccines administered to service and medical personnel serving in Operation Granby is referred to his Department's continuing review of the origins and consequences of Gulf war syndrome. [24291]

Mr. Soames: My Department will consider all relevant research material on the health problems experienced by Gulf veterans.

Patriot Missiles

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evaluation has been made of the effectiveness of patriot missiles during the Gulf war. [24199]

Mr. Soames: It is not our practice to comment on the effectiveness of military equipment used by allies, unless it is also in service with our own forces.

Defence Accounts Agency (Visits)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what visits on official business staff of the defence accounts agency have undertaken in the last 12 months; what was the date and purpose of the visits in each case; how many members of staff the agency has working in non-United Kingdom locations for periods in excess of three months; and in which countries they are located. [24190]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the chief executive of the Defence Pay and Personnel Agency. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from M. A. Rowe to Mr. Jim Cousins, dated 3 April 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about visits on official business and overseas working as the matters referred to fall within my responsibilities as Chief Executive of the Pay & Personnel Agency.

The Pay & Personnel Agency, in common with its predecessor the Defence Accounts Agency, does not maintain records in the detail you ask, and to assemble the necessary statistics would entail the expenditure of disproportionate time and cost. It is, however, Agency practice that all such visits are properly scrutinised before they take place and are only undertaken when alternative arrangements are not practical.

The Pay & Personnel Agency employs six people in a non-United Kingdom location. These are civilian staff locally employed in Malta, administering the pension entitlements of Maltese nationals who were at one time employed by the United Kingdom Government.

Alcohol Awareness Policy

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will review the alcohol awareness policy for the armed forces (a) in the United Kingdom, (b) in Cyprus and (c) in other overseas ports; and if he will make a statement. [24473]

Mr. Soames: The armed forces have a comprehensive alcohol awareness policy. Each service has in place a comprehensive system of education and training on alcohol-related problems. Pamphlets, films and lectures are used to make all personnel aware of the dangers of abuse. Education on alcohol abuse is given to all new recruits on entry and this is continued in units regularly and prior to deployment overseas. Commanding officers are encouraged to limit the number of bars in their units, and opening hours are controlled and monitored. Instructions are published regularly in unit orders to remind personnel of their responsibilities in these matters and the pursuit of sport and other leisure activities is actively encouraged as a means of preventing personnel becoming bored and spending too much time in bars. Officers and non-commissioned officers are trained to recognise symptoms of abuse and all three services offer rehabilitation programmes for those with alcohol-related problems.

Misconduct in relation to alcohol is dealt with as a disciplinary issue. Drunkenness is a specific offence under the Service Discipline Acts and charges are brought where appropriate.

The policy applies equally at home and overseas, but local commanders may carry out additional awareness training as may be necessary to cover local conditions.

In Cyprus all new arrivals, service, civilians and dependants over 18, as well as all visiting personnel and units, are briefed on the dangers of alcohol abuse. This message is reinforced regularly through a rolling programme of alcohol abuse briefings, through routine orders and other orders and the chain of command. The Soldiers, Sailors and Air Force Association further reinforces this message through an active command health promotion programme. The commander, British forces Cyprus keeps the policy on alcohol abuse under constant review, imposing, as necessary, restrictions such as out-of-bounds arrangements or requirements for personnel to sign out and sign in when leaving and returning to barracks in off-duty time. In the wake of the Louise Jensen trial, the commander, British forces Cyprus has begun a full and radical review of what more might be done.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24411]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The capability of the Ministry of Defence's existing computer systems to recognise the year 2000 date change is already under investigation and an initial impact survey has been carried out to give an indication of the likely extent of the problem.

Early signs are that the effects may not be as severe as originally thought since the managers of most of the MOD's computer systems have already taken action to avoid date change errors. However, further work is in hand to provide a more comprehensive picture and it is expected that this will lead to the issue of guidance to computer users and systems managers. The work being undertaken currently by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency on this matter is being carefully monitored.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24505]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As set out in the statement on the defence estimates 1995, Cm 2800, the Department is reviewing its overall waste management arrangements, including waste minimisation. Office waste is only one of many defence waste streams. The Department of the Environment is producing guidance on the minimisation of office waste, on which we intend to draw in formulating MOD strategies for waste management and minimisation.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

War Pension Appeals

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average time lapse between notice of appeal being given to the war pensions appeal tribunal and the case being heard; what is the shortest time; and what is the longest time before an appeal has been heard. [24044]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: As at February 1996, the average time for a case to be heard at the pensions appeal tribunals from the date the appeal was received was 55 weeks. Of those cases finally determined during that month, the shortest waiting time was nine weeks and the longest 302 weeks.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the age profile in five-yearly intervals of outstanding applicants before the war pensions appeal tribunal. [24046]

Mr. Evans: This information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many applicants before the war pensions appeal tribunal are cases alleging combat-induced post-traumatic stress disorder. [24048]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available as the pensions appeal tribunals do not record appeals by the type of medical condition subject to appeal.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the number of appeals currently outstanding before the war pensions appeal tribunal; and what was the number for each year for the past 10 years. [24043]

Mr. Evans: As at February 1996, there were 10,657 appeals outstanding. The number of appeals lodged has increased threefold in the last three years. The number outstanding as at the end of each of the last 10 years was as follows:

1986: 1,841
1987: 2,194
1988: 1,837
1989: 2,135
1990: 1,658

1991: 1,821

1992: 1,356

1993: 2,405

1994: 5,737

1995: 9,697

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what estimate he has made of the increase in throughput of appeals before the war pensions appeal tribunal as a result of the recent increase in tribunal members. [24045]

Mr. Evans: The appointment of additional tribunal members during 1995 has meant that the number of venues where appeals are normally heard on a weekly basis has increased from four to eight, and it is planned to increase that number to 10 in may . In 1995, 4,907 cases were decided, compared with 2,863 in 1994.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases before the war pensions appeal tribunal have lapsed as a result of the death of the applicant. [24047]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available as the pensions appeal tribunals do not keep a record of cases that have lapsed due to the death of the appellant. There is provision for the next of kin to continue the case.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24405]

Mr. Evans: My Department is aware of this potential problem and is assessing the impact on its computer systems.

County Court Service (Wales)

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what proposals he has to reorganise the county court service in Wales. [24521]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Ron Davies, dated 3 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the county courts in Wales.

The Court Service constantly monitors and reviews the viability of its court network in the light of changing business needs and workload trends. A business case has been submitted to Court Service Headquarters proposing the transfer of administrative work from Ammanford County Court to the county courts at Llanelli and Carmarthen and to a new court centre at Swansea but retaining judicial sittings at Ammanford. Initial business cases are also being considered for the closure of Mold and Holywell County Courts. All proposal will be subject to a period of widespread public consultation. The final decision on the closure of any county court is, however, for the Lord Chancellor.

A survey of users has been conducted at Chepstow, Aberdare and Caerphilly County Courts to establish the extent of the service that these courts provide to the public. The results of the surveys are currently being evaluated and no decisions have yet been made.

The structure of the Wales and Chester Circuit is also being reshaped as part of the Court Service Management Structure Review. This is an administrative reorganisation and there will be no effect on the business of the county courts.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases were heard during each of the last three years at Caerphilly county court; and what percentage of these cases received legal aid. [24522]

Mr. Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Ron Davies, dated 3 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of cases heard at Caerphilly County Court.

No Circuit Judge sits at Caerphilly County Court; instead cases are listed at the trial centre at Pontypridd. In 1995/6, 25 cases from Caerphilly were heard at Pontypridd. It is not possible to identify Caerphilly cases from Pontypridd's lists for the earlier two years.

In 1993/94, 220 District Judge hearings were held in open court and 768 in chambers. In 1994/5 these numbered 164 and 746 respectively and in 1995/6, 89 and 773. It is not possible to identify which of these involved parties receiving legal aid and this information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the current annual cost of providing the County court service in Caerphilly. [24517]

Mr. Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Ron Davies, dated 3 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the cost of providing the county court service at Caerphilly.

The annual cost, including judicial and administrative salaries and accommodation and running costs, is approximately £93,269.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24508]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Lord Chancellor's Department will set a target for overall waste reduction by December 1996.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of outsourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24232]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My Department has not entered into any outsourcing contracts with EDS.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what outsourcing contracts his agencies have with the EDS software computer system; what is the current cost; when the contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [23727]

Mr. Evans: The Lord Chancellor has responsibility for four agencies: the Court Service, HM Land Registry, the Public Record Office and the Public Trust Office. As the question concerns a specific operational matter, the chief executives of the agencies have been asked to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to the above Question about the number of computer contracts held by the firm EDS.

The Court Service has no computer contracts with this company.

Letter from Julia C. Lomas to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply to you as part of the Lord Chancellor's Department's response to your Parliamentary Question, listed on 27 March 1996, regarding out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

The Public Trust Office does not have any out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Letter from John Manthorpe to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, to reply to your recent question concerning out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system. H M Land Registry has granted no such contracts to this company.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply for the Public Record Office to your question about out-sourcing contracts.

The Public Record Office has no out-sourcing contracts with the EDS software computer system.

Metropolitan Police (Civilian Officers)

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if the transfer of civilian enforcement officers from the Metropolitan police service to the inner and outer London magistrates courts will be covered by the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 and the acquired rights directive. [23445]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I have received legal advice stating that, in general, transfers of civilian enforcement staff from the police to magistrates courts committees are likely to be subject to these regulations. Whether the regulations apply in any particular situation depends on all the facts of the case, which will be different from one area to the next. Each magistrates courts committee or police authority involved in a transfer of staff must therefore determine for itself whether the regulations will apply to it, obtaining its own legal advice on the matter if necessary.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department which interested parties or bodies were consulted about the decision to transfer the posts and duties of civilian enforcement officers from the Metropolitan police service to the inner and outer London magistrates courts. [23443]

Mr. Evans: The following organisations were consulted either by my Department or by the Home Office about the decision to transfer the responsibility for enforcement duties from the police throughout England and Wales to magistrates courts committees, every MCC, including the inner London magistrates courts service and all outer London MCCs; the Central Council of MCCs; the Magistrates Association, the Justices' Clerks' Society; the Standing Conference of Justices' Chief Executives and Clerks to MCCs; the Association of Magisterial Officers; the Association of Chief Police Officers. Decisions on the transfer of individual posts will be for the Metropolitan police and the relevant MCCs to resolve jointly. So far as I am aware, no such decisions have yet been made by those bodies.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if legislation will be required to enable civilian enforcement officers to carry out their duties when they are no longer employed as the direct agents of the commissioner for the Metropolitan police. [23446]

Mr. Evans: No legislation will be required to enable civilian enforcement officers to carry out their duties if, instead of being employed by the Metropolitan police, they are employed and duly authorised by a magistrates courts committee, by a local authority or by another police authority. We are currently clarifying whether legislation would be required to enable civilian enforcement officers to carry out enforcement duties in other circumstances.

SCOTLAND

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mrs. Liddell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what total level of compensation has been given to farmers for the destruction of cattle infected with bovine spongiform encephalopathy in each year since 1990 in Scotland. [22935]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information requested is held centrally on the basis of Great Britain as a whole, and a breakdown by country could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The total level of compensation paid to farmers on a Great Britain basis in each year since 1990 was:

1990: £12.3 million

1991: £28.1 million

1992: £56.3 million

1993: £92.6 million

1994: £116.2 million

1995: £126.6 million

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cattle have been identified as suffering from BSE in Scotland by (a) breed and (b) number for each year since 1993. [23792]

Mr. Robertson: The information requested is as shown in the following tables:

Breed	Cases confirmed at 1 March 1996
Aberdeen Angus	28
Aberdeen Angus crosses	489
Ayrshire	391
Ayrshire crosses	29
Charolais	38

Mrs. Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which inhabited Scottish islands have had no recorded cases of BSE since 1989. [23793]

Mr. Robertson: Information on incidence of BSE is collected on a regional basis and a breakdown of the detail requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Countryside Premium Scheme

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money will be available from the countryside premium scheme for 1996–97 and 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [23794]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Around £2 million is available for the countryside premium scheme in 1996–1997 although the timetable for bringing the scheme into operation means that it is difficult to predict how much of this amount will be required. My noble Friend will decide later this year on the funding requirements for the scheme in 1997–98.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which further education colleges in Scotland will have their grant in aid reduced in 1996–97; by how much; for what reasons; and which of these will be required to educate more students than the current year. [24038]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The information is set out in the table.

College	Variation from 1995–96 grant £
Ayr	-84,300
Barony	-22,500
Bell	-265,200
Clackmannan	-14,100
Clydebank	-291,300
Coatbridge	-188,400
Dumfries and Galloway	-135,900
Dundee	-525,100
Falkirk	-60,600
Fife	-371,900
Glasgow College of Building and Printing	-241,600
Glasgow College of Food Technology	-168,700
Glasgow College of Nautical Studies	-191,100
Glenrothes	-136,700
Inverness	-314,400
Jewel and Esk Valley	-369,800
Lews Castle	-103,200
Oatridge	-94,400
Stevenson	-131,900
Thurso	-133,000
West Lothian	-241,300

Grant levels of these colleges are reducing as a result of the implementation of a new funding formula, which rewards colleges which have been most successful in reducing unit costs and attracting and retaining students. No specific targets for student growth have been set for these colleges.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what efficiency savings have been required of the further education colleges in each year since incorporation; and what is the total amount of money saved since incorporation. [24039]

Mr. Robertson: Colleges were expected to achieve an efficiency saving of 3 per cent. 1993–94 and 1994–95 and 4 per cent. in 1995–96. Because financial information pre and post incorporation cannot be meaningfully compared, it is not possible to quantify the amounts of money saved. Between 1993–94 and 1994–95 colleges delivered efficiency gains of 4 per cent. on student activity which was 6 per cent. higher.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research has been conducted by his Department in Scotland on the consequences of incorporation of further education colleges. [24040]

Mr. Robertson: A research study into the operation of further education college boards of management, funded by the Scottish Office, was published in June 1995. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of (a) administrative and (b) management staff employed at colleges (i) on the date of incorporation and (ii) at present. [24041]

Mr. Robertson: Information on the number of administrative and management staff employed at colleges on the date of incorporation is not held centrally. The total full-time equivalent number of support staff, on a disaggregated basis, in academic year 1994–95, the latest for which information is available, was 4,517.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many lecturing staff were employed in further education colleges (a) at the date of incorporation and (b) at present; and how many were (i) full time and (ii) part time. [24031]

Mr. Robertson: The information is set out in the table.

	Number
October 1992
Full-time	5,562
Part-time	4,960
Full-time equivalent	6,850
Academic year 1994–95
Full-time	5,606
Part-time	7,448
Full-time equivalent	6,903

Information on staff numbers at 1 April 1993 is not held centrally. The October 1992 figure is the information collated prior to incorporation. Academic staff numbers are now collated on an academic year basis.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which colleges of further education were in deficit at the end of the last financial year; by how much; and which colleges his Department assesses to be in deficit in the current financial year. [24032]

Mr. Robertson: At 31 March 1995 the audited accounts showed that the deficit on total reserves, after making provision for the future cost of pension enhancements given for early retirement, for the following colleges was as shown in the table.

College	£000
Aberdeen	–565
Anniesland	–153
Central College of Commerce	–59
Clydebank	–305
Coatbridge	–239
Falkirk	–346
James Watt	–309
John Wheatley	–56
Langside	–134
Moray	–543
North Glasgow	–1,129
Stevenson	–593
Thurso	–101
West Lothian	–96

Information regarding financial outturns at 31 March 1996 is not yet available.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy that no (a) closures and (b) amalgamations of further education colleges will occur in the next financial year. [24033]

Mr. Robertson: My right hon. Friend has presently no plans to close or amalgamate colleges.

Clydesbank College

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what basis he reduced the budget of Clydebank college in the current year. [24034]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Formula funding aims to increase student participation on a cost-effective basis whilst maintaining quality. It rewards colleges which have been most successful in reducing unit costs and attracting and retaining students. The reduction in 1996–97 was largely due to the college's failure to attract additional students. The setting of the college budget is undertaken by the college board of management.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the financial position of Clydebank college. [24035]

Mr. Robertson: The latest audited accounts to 31 March 1995 show that Clydebank college had a deficit since incorporation of £70,000. In addition a deficit of £235,000 was inherited from pre-incorporation. Officials are in dialogue with college management over their plans to address its financial position.

Further Education Budget

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the strategic aim of his method of calculating the further education budget in terms of increasing skill levels in Scotland. [24036]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The aim is to increase student participation on a cost-effective basis, while maintaining quality, and thus increase the skills levels and economic competitiveness of Scotland.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what account he takes of levels of local unemployment in allocating budgets to further education colleges. [24037]

Mr. Robertson: None, as investigation has shown this not to be a significant factor in determining the total costs of colleges. Colleges delivered 6 per cent. more student activity between 1993–94 and 1994–95. Higher levels of student activity are enhancing employment prospects.

Inward Investment

Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the name and location of new industries that have been attracted to Scotland by Locate in Scotland during the last 12 months. [24282]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: All our dealings with inward investors are undertaken on a commercially confidential basis and we do not therefore publish details of individual projects except in cases where details of the project have been announced by the company itself. The following table contains details of the new projects attracted to Scotland which have been the subject of public announcements since April 1995. A number of inward investors have of course also announced plans to expand their existing facilities in Scotland.

Date of announcement	Company	Location
April 1995	Birkbys Plastics Ltd.	Glenrothes
April 1995	Patrol Manufacturing	Glasgow
June 1995	Selfcare Inc.	Inverness

October 1995	Lexmark International	Rosyth
November 1995	Chunghwa Picture Tubes Ltd.	Mossend
November 1995	Motorola	East Kilbride
November 1995	Foxconn UK Ltd.	Erskine
February 1996	DuPont	Hamilton

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24403]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office is taking steps to ensure that administrative computer systems for which it is responsible will recognise the year 2000 and will continue to process information properly.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24500]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office is introducing an environmental management system based on the British Standard BS7750 for its largest building at Victoria quay in Edinburgh. As part of the system waste minimisation targets will be set and introduced as appropriate across the remainder of the estate. The initial review for the system has been completed and data collected in order to develop waste minimisation targets by the end of 1996.

Scottish Agricultural Science Agency

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the performance of the Scottish Agricultural Science Agency against targets for 1995–96 and the setting of its targets for 1996–97. [24978]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The agency is on course to meet the Commons targets for 1995–96 which my predecessor set out in his answer of 9 February 1995, Official Report, columns 359–60.

For 1996–97 I have set the agency the following key performance targets:

fulfilment of the service level agreement with the Scottish Office agriculture, environment and fisheries department within the running costs voted to the agency for 1996–97; recovery of full economic costs for charged services;

continuation of the programme of consultation of all major customers on the quality of the work done by the agency; completion of 92 per cent. of all scientific tests and analyses within the timescale set by customers; and improvement in the unit of the scientific work of the agency (cost per direct scientist hour).

Air Pollution

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of the 1996–97 charging scheme for local air pollution control in Scotland under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. [25181]

Mr. Kynoch: Charges to cover the costs of local enforcing authorities in regulating processes which are subject to part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 were introduced in Scotland in April 1992.

With the approval of the Treasury, and following consultation with local authority associations and industry, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has made a revised scheme specifying the scale of fees and charges to take effect from 31 March 1996. From 1 April, the new Scottish Environment Protection Agency has taken over the regulation of these processes.

The main changes are that the standard application fee is increased by £25 to £1,015, the application fee for a former Alkali Act works is reduced to £300, the substantial change fee is increased by £15 to £650, and the annual subsistence charge is increased by £20 to £625.

The scheme has today been laid before both Houses of Parliament and a copy placed in the Libraries.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to review the workings of the environmentally sensitive area agri-environment scheme in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [23016]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 1 April 1996]: All aspects of the workings of the environmentally sensitive area scheme are kept under review.

Abattoirs (Hygiene Standards)

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent assessment he has made of the hygiene standards in Scottish abattoirs. [24444]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 2 April 1996]: I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked the chief executive of the Meat Hygiene Service to reply to the hon. Member direct. The Meat Hygiene Service operates across Great Britain and is accountable to the British Agriculture Ministers jointly.

Self-catering Properties (Rateable Value)

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what account is taken of (a) wages of the spouse of proprietor, (b) self-employed national insurance contributions, (c) pension contributions of the proprietor and spouse of proprietor and (d) turnover in assessment of the rateable value of self-catering properties; [24260]

(2) if he will list the criteria used in the assessment of the rateable value of self-catering premises. [24266]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 2 April 1996]: Valuation for rating in Scotland is the responsibility of either the council or valuation joint board assessor as appropriate. In carrying out this function assessors are entirely independent of both local and central Government and reach their decisions in accordance with statute and case law.

Government Expenditure Plans

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the planned expenditure falling within the Scottish block of the Government's spending plans in respect of (a) industry, (b) housing, (c) roads and transport, (d) law and order, (e) education, (f) arts and libraries, (g) environmental services, (h) social work services and (i) health, for each of the years 1989–90 to 1994–95 inclusive, the outturn expenditure for 1995–96, the estimated outturn expenditure and for 1996–97, using 1989–90 as the base year for comparison and excluding expenditure on additional functions taken on as a responsibility by the Secretary of State since 1989–90, and adjusting for transfers between programmes. [8724]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 March 1996]: A tabulation on the lines requested is contained in my departmental report, a copy of which has been deposited in the House Library.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the total expenditure of his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies on publicity for each of the years (a) 1979–80, (b) 1989–90, (c) 1991–92, (d) 1993–94, (e) 1994–95 and (f) 1995–96 (i) to date and (ii) as estimated for the whole year; what estimate he has made of such expenditure for 1996–97; and if he will break these figures down to indicate expenditure on (1) advertising and (2) press and public relations. [11356]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 25 January 1996]: Expenditure by Scottish Office Departments and its agencies was as follows:

Year	Total expenditure	Press and PR	Print and publications	Advertising
1979–80	263,000	n/a	n/a	n/a
1989–90	2,251,000	n/a	763,000	1,488,000
1991–92	3,905,000	1,900,000	785,000	1,220,000
1993–94	3,174,000	1,300,000	816,000	1,058,000
1994–95	4,192,000	1,461,000	1,049,000	1,682,000
1995–96	4,507,000	964,000	1,724,000	1,819,000

n/a = not available.

Advertising includes press, television, radio, cinema and poster advertising.

Budgets for 1996–97 have not yet been finalised.

Details of expenditure by non-departmental public bodies are not held centrally.

Running costs figures are shown in the column headed Press and PR. No public relations companies have been employed during these years.

The Scottish Office and its agencies carry out pre-post evaluation of all their publicity campaigns and their accounts are audited on a regular basis.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East Peace Process

17. Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the peace process in the middle east. [22629]

Mr. Hanley: We have been appalled at the recent terrorist attacks in Israel.

The UK condemns these outrages and will work with her friends and allies to combat the terrorist threat and continue to work for peace.

36. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit the middle east in 1996 to discuss the peace process. [22649]

18. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to follow up the recent peace conference to help ensure the security of Israel. [22630]

Mr. Hanley: A meeting of officials to follow up the Sharm el-Sheikh conference took place in Washington on 27 to 29 March. The UK will play a full part in preparation of a ministerial level follow-up to take place later this week.

Taiwan

22. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he is having with representatives of the Government of the USA on the question of differences between China and the USA over the future of Taiwan. [22635]

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary discussed the current tensions between China and Taiwan when he met US Secretary of State Christopher in Moscow on 23 March. They agreed to remain in close contact and to urge both sides to resume dialogue as soon as possible.

25. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Chinese Government over their planned exercises off Taiwan. [22638]

Mr. Hanley: We made our grave concerns about the Chinese military exercises known to the Chinese both directly and through our public and parliamentary statements. The EU issued a statement on 8 March. Although military exercises have now finished, we continue to urge restraint and an early resumption of cross-straits dialogue.

European Union

23. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals the Government plan to put forward to improve openness and transparency within the European Union. [22636]

Mr. David Davis: We are committed to making the European Union more open and transparent and have supported a number of proposals to achieve this. We are considering our policy on any proposals for more openness and transparency, in the context of the on-going intergovernmental conference.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

24. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what basis Ministers in his Department sign public interest immunity certificates. [22637]

Mr. Hanley: We are guided by the law according to which in appropriate cases we weigh, but subject always to the overriding discretion of the court, the public interest in non-disclosure against the public interests in disclosure for the purposes of doing justice.

European Security Policy

26. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European counterparts over a common security policy. [22639]

Mr. David Davis: I regularly discuss common foreign and security policy matters with my EU counterparts, most recently at the Foreign affairs Council on 25 March.

28. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends next to raise the subject of European Security at the ministerial Council of the Western European Union. [22641]

Mr. Davis: European security will be discussed by the WEU Council of Ministers at its next meeting in Birmingham on 7 May, under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and me.

Nuclear Proliferation

27. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what new proposals he has to reduce nuclear proliferation. [22640]

Mr. David Davis: We are currently supporting a number of initiatives intended to strengthen the international nuclear non-proliferation regime. These include the International Atomic Energy Agency's efforts to improve its ability to detect clandestine nuclear activities, support for early conclusion of a comprehensive test ban treaty, and a range of measures to make more effective relevant supplier regimes.

Gibraltar

29. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when was the last meeting between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Gibraltar to discuss the future of the colony; and when the next meeting is planned. [22642]

Mr. David Davis: We are in regular contact at ministerial and official level with the Government of Gibraltar on the range of issues which affect the territory. These contacts will be maintained. I was in Gibraltar last November for discussions with a wide range of Gibraltarians, including the Chief Minister and representatives of other political parties.

European Institutions

31. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to encourage greater access to European institutions by members of national Parliaments of EU member states. [22644]

Mr. David Davis: We support greater involvement of national Parliaments in the European Union, and more contact between national parliamentarians and the European institutions. We are looking at how to take this forward in the forthcoming intergovernmental conference.

Sub-Saharan African

33. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement setting out his Department's priorities for sub-Saharan Africa. [22646]

Mr. Hanley: Our priorities are to ensure political and economic stability in the region through the promotion of democracy and good government—including free and fair elections; to encourage the support of conflict prevention and peacekeeping; to promote human rights and to promote UK trade and investment and harmonious bilateral relations.

Western Sahara

34. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to bring forward the date of a referendum on the future of the Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement. [22647]

Mr. Hanley: We continue to urge full co-operation with the UN operation in the Western Sahara by Morocco and Polisario, which would establish the date for a referendum. In our view, the earlier the details of the referendum can be agreed, the better.

Counter-terrorist Initiatives

35. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what (a) guidance and (b) assistance he has given counter-terrorist initiatives in respect of the (i) Israeli and (ii) Palestinian authorities following the conference at Sharm-el-Sheikh. [22648]

Mr. Hanley: We co-operate against terrorism with both the Israeli Government and the Palestine National Authority and we are urgently examining ways in which to deepen that co-operation.

Iraq

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions the United Nations special commission on Iraq has investigated (a) mines and (b) processing plants for phosphates or phosphoric materials in Iraq; and what conclusions they reached. [24200]

Mr. David Davis: UNSCOM has inspected numerous facilities in Iraq connected with the production of phosphates or phosphoric materials. Those with the potential to be involved in producing weapons of mass destruction have either been destroyed or included in the ongoing monitoring and verification system. There is further detail in the UNSCOM report of 10 April 1995, a copy of which is in the Libraries of the House.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what savings to date have been made by his Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with the EDS computer system; what assessment he has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in-house; and if he will make a statement. [24227]

Mr. Hanley: This Department has no out-sourcing arrangements with EDS.

Cyprus

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's role as a guarantor power in Cyprus. [22929]

Mr. David Davis: The United Kingdom, along with Greece and Turkey, is a joint guarantor power of the Republic of Cyprus under the 1960 treaty of guarantee. Britain is at the forefront of international efforts to find a solution to the Cyprus problem.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to his Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24408]

Mr. Hanley: This Department has put in hand a study to determine which, if any, of its computer systems will be affected by this problem. In addition, the Government Centre for Information Systems has initiated a programme of consultation and education in which we are participating.

The Overseas Development Administration is updating its computer systems, most of which already recognise the year 2000. In the process, adjustments are being to the two systems that require changes for the next year 2000. These adjustments will be completed within the next 18 months.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24511]

Mr. Hanley: We aim to put in place office waste minimisation targets by the end of 1996, in keeping with the commitment in the Government White Paper "Making Waste Work". The overall target will be reduce the amount of waste by 15 per cent. over the period 1 April 1996 to 31 March 1998.

Terrorism Conference

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent conference in Cairo to discuss measures to combat terrorism. [22631]

Mr. Hanley: A meeting of officials to follow up the Sharm el-Sheikh conference took place in Washington on 27 and 29 March. The UK will play a full part in preparation of a ministerial level follow-up to take place later this week.

British Council

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future funding of the British Council's work in the middle east. [22645]

Mr. Hanley: The British Council plays an extremely valuable role in supporting our diplomatic and aid objectives in the middle east. Following the recent public expenditure survey settlement, we will shortly be discussing with the British Council its proposals for the distribution of resources both between and within individual regions.

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the work of the British Council in the middle east; and if he will make a statement [22643]

Mr. Hanley: Heads of mission in middle east countries where the British Council is represented, provide regular assessments of the council's work. These serve to confirm that the council makes a very valuable contribution to our diplomatic and aid objectives.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Executive Action

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those areas of executive action where he has discretion to act in respect of an individual without giving reasons for his decision. [20539]

Mr. Howard: As I stated in my reply to the hon. Member on 14 March, Official Report, column 712, comprehensive records are not kept in the form requested. Section 44(2) of the British Nationality Act 1981 expressly provides that I am not required to give reasons for my decisions on applications for citizenship.

Firearms

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences committed by young people between the ages of 11 and 18 to 25 years have involved firearms in each of the last five years. [23732]

Mr. Maclean: Data held centrally on notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used does not identify those responsible for the offences.

Information for the years 1990 to 1994 on the number of persons cautioned and convicted of offences involving the use of firearms, including air weapons, in England and Wales by age group and type of offence, is given in the table.

Data for 1995 will not be available until autumn 1996.

Number of persons cautioned and found guilty (known offenders) of offences involving the use of firearms by age and type of offence 1990–1994

England and Wales

Year/age group	Indictable	Summary
11-17 years of age
1990	424	1,491
1991	434	1,146
1992	326	1,103
1993	340	854
1994	443	1,005
18-25 years of age
1990	1,514	1,453
1991	1,509	1,201
1992	1,418	973
1993	1,268	635
1994	1,344	548

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the estimated number of hand-guns in Wales. [23754]

Mr. Maclean: The number of hand guns legally held on firearms certificates in Wales is estimated by the police forces concerned to be about 13,500.

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many existing gun licences by police authority have been revoked during the past five years. [23986]

Mr. Maclean: Information on the number of revocations of both firearm and shotgun licences, by police force, is published in the annual Home Office Statistical Bulletin "Firearm Certificate Statistics, England and Wales", copies of which can be found in the Library.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many gun licences have been renewed during the last five years in South Yorkshire; [23988]

(2) how many new gun licences have been (a) considered, (b) approved and (c) refused in each of the last five years in South Yorkshire. [23987]

Mr. Maclean: The readily available information is shown in the following table:

Firearm and shotgun certificates—South Yorkshire

	New certificates				Renewals
	Firearms		Shotguns
	Granted	Refused	Granted	Refused	Firearms	Shotguns
1990	137	2	439	14	440	2,713
1991	125	3	556	15	486	2,576
1992	128	—	457	17	507	1,870
1993	184	—	527	7	385	2,603
1994	197	—	470	15	374	2,184

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of residents with a licence to keep a firearm on their premises in South Yorkshire (a) at present, (b) last year, (c) in 1991 and (d) in 1986. [23989]

Mr. Maclean: The readily available information relates to the number of firearm and shotgun certificates on issue in South Yorkshire at 31 December each year. This is as follows:

Firearm and shotgun certificates on issue in South Yorkshire at 31 December

	Firearm certificates	Shotgun certificates
1986	1,718	11,460
1991	1,507	8,806
1993	1,597	9,174
1994	1,766	9,137

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the discussion paper on possible changes to the control of firearms which was put before the Firearms Consultative Committee by its two police members referred to in chapter 3 of the fourth annual report of the Firearms Consultative Committee. [24082]

Mr. Maclean: Copies of the Firearms Consultative Committee's annual reports are in the Library. Chapter 3 and annex E of the committee's fourth annual report contained a summary of the proposals made in the discussion paper referred to. The release of individual papers submitted to the Firearms Consultative Committee is a matter for the committee and the authors of the paper.

Metropolitan Police (Civilian Officers)

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations were received by the Metropolitan Police service from interested parties or bodies about the decision to transfer the posts and duties of civilian enforcement officers to the inner and outer London magistrates courts. [23444]

Mr. Maclean: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that his officials have received representations from the trade union side of the departmental Whitley council, the Public Services, Tax and Commerce Union, and that the Metropolitan police have liaised with the chair of the strategic management body for the outer London courts, a number of clerks for inner and outer London magistrates courts, the Lord Chancellor's Department, and the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Police National Computer

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 25 March, Official Report, column 406, how many individual records for criminal convictions are held on the police national computer. [23537]

Mr. Maclean: Criminal record data held on the police national computer comprise 2.8 million records originating before 1981, which consist of name and criminal record office number and which are supported by microfiche records of convictions held by the national identification service, and 2.3 million records originating after 1981 which include details of convictions.

CS Gas

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the concentration of active agent used in the CS sprays currently on trial; what is the solvent used; and what is the total volume of liquid in each canister. [23563]

Mr. Maclean: The information is as follows: 5 per cent., methyl isobutyl ketone and 30 ccs.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will institute an urgent inquiry into the use of CS gas spray during an incident in Rank's south Wirral leisure park on 25 March. [23965]

Mr. Maclean: No. This is an operational matter for the chief constable, who is conducting an investigation.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) on how many occasions Merseyside police have used CS gas since its introduction on a trial basis in the Birkenhead division; [23963]

(2) on how many occasions CS spray has been used in each pilot area in the United Kingdom; [24711]

(3) on how many occasions CS spray has been used in the pilot areas after the initial arrest. [24709]

Mr. Maclean: Statistical information will be made available when the trials are complete.

Gamma Hydroxy Butyrate

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases of the misuse of gamma hydroxy butyrate have been reported to his Department during the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [24140]

Mr. Sackville: There is no requirement to report cases of misuse of gammahydroxybutyrate to the Home Office and any reports to the Department of health's drug misuse databases are not at present recorded separately.

Mr. Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations his Department has received that gamma hydroxy butyrate be re-classified as a dangerous drug and added to the list of controlled substances. [24139]

Mr. Sackville: Since mid-1994 we have received seven letters, three questions from Members of Parliament and a similar small number of letters from members of the public about the classification of the drug under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971.

Immigration

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many non-EC nationals travelling to the United Kingdom from other EU member states were found by the United Kingdom immigration service to have inadequate travel or entry documentation in terms of United Kingdom requirements during 1995 (a) at Heathrow airport, (b) at the port of Dover, (c) on trains from Brussels or Paris, (d) at Waterloo station and (e) at Coquelles shuttle terminal; and how many in each category were refused leave to enter the United Kingdom. [24003]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The number arriving specifically from European Union airports is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

(b) 1,526.

(c) Subsumed within the figure at (d) (all Paris and Brussels trains terminate at Waterloo; records are not maintained according to the place of embarkation).

(d) 1,218.

(e) All passengers travelling to the United Kingdom via Coquelles are seen by a United Kingdom immigration officer at Coquelles; those without adequate documentation are not permitted to travel.

Statistics relating to the number of passengers who arrive both without adequate documentation and who are also refused leave to enter are not readily available. Such information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many £2,000 penalties were notified to carriers under the terms of the Immigration (Carriers Liability) Act 1987 in respect of non-EC nationals travelling to the United Kingdom from other EU member states who were found to have inadequate travel or entry documentation in terms of United Kingdom requirements during 1995 (a) at Heathrow airport, (b) at the port of Dover, (c) on trains from Brussels or Paris, (d) at Waterloo station and (e) at Coquelles shuttle terminal. [24098]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The number arriving specifically from European Union airports is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

(b) 116.

(c) The provisions of the Act do not apply to channel tunnel traffic.

(d) The provisions of the Act do not apply to channel tunnel traffic.

(e) The provisions of the Act do not apply to channel tunnel traffic.

Deportations

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were deported in (a) January, (b) February and (c) March. [24426]

Mr. Kirkhope: The numbers of persons removed under the deportation process, including voluntary departures after deportation action had been initiated, in January and February 1996 were 149 in each month. In addition, 241 and 197 illegal entrants were removed, or departed voluntarily, in the respective months. All the figures are provisional. The corresponding data for March are not yet available.

Winson Green Prison

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those people detained in HM prison Winson Green under Immigration Act powers during the months of January, February and March have been deported. [24425]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alastair Papps to Lynne Jones, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking, how many of those people detained in Birmingham prison under Immigration Act powers during the months of January, February and March have been deported.

There were 23 people discharged and deported from Birmingham prison in January and 22 in February. There is no information currently available for March.

Dr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were detained in HM prison Winson Green, under Immigration Act powers in (a) January, (b) February and (c) March; and what were the nationalities of those detained. [24424]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alastair Papps to Lynne Jones, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking, how many people were detained in Birmingham prison under Immigration Act powers in (a) January, (b) February and (c) March; and what were the nationalities of those detained.

Information for 31 January and 29 February is given in the attached table. There is no information currently available for March.

Doncaster Prison

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who are the current members of the race relations management team for Doncaster prison; in each case where is their place of (a) employment and (b) residence. [24489]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the members of the race relations management team for Doncaster prison.

I attach a table with details of the employment and residence of the members of the race relations management team at Doncaster.

Metropolitan Police Art Theft Squad

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many full-time and part-time members of the police, and at what rank, worked in the art theft squad of the Metropolitan police at any convenient date in 1976, 1986, 1991 and 1996; and if he will make a statement. [23152]

Mr. Maclean: I understand that precise records are not available for 1976 but that the unit then employed a total of some 13 staff. The unit was not operating as such in 1986. In 1991 there were three staff, one of whom was a civilian. The present staffing is one detective sergeant, two detective constables and two civilian staff. I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the name and remit of the art and antiques unit, originally the philatelic squad, has changed several times since its inception in 1968.

Buckley Hall Prison

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will specify what (a) improvements and (b) other recommendations have been made by the Prison Service's regional area manager with respect to Buckley Hall prison; which have been implemented; and on what dates. [24168]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Alastair Papps to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the timing and implementation of improvements and other recommendations at Buckley Hall which have been made by the Prison Service area manager.

The area manager tours Buckley Hall prison in the company of the Director and Controller. During this tour he may make numerous verbal recommendations of an advisory nature. This is fully in keeping with the type of observations which he would make in any of the public sector prisons for which he is responsible. The Controller, who is present, ensures that recommendations are implemented.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the present full complement of (a) part-time and (b) full-time staff by grade currently employed by Group 4 at Buckley Hall prison; [24172]

(2) what is the full complement of (a) part-time and (b) full-time staff by grade employed by Group 4 at the end of Buckley Hall prison's first year of operation; [24171]

(3) how many ex-Prison Service staff are currently employed by Group 4 at Buckley Hall; and at what grades; [24094]

(4) what has been the cost of damage to the building, fixtures and fittings as a result of disturbances and other incidents at Buckley Hall from the date of opening to the present time; and what proportion of these costs have been borne by (a) his Department and (b) Group 4. [24095]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about Buckley Hall prison.

The table below shows the complement of full-time and part-time staff (excluding sub-contractors) employed by Group 4 at Buckley Hall prison at the end of the first year of operation and currently.

Month	Full-time staff	Part-time staff
End December 1995	131	18
End March 1996	138	25

The previous employment of any staff at the prison is a matter for Group 4. Prison Service responsibility is limited to the certification of prisoner custody officers. However, I understand that seven staff who are currently employed at Buckley Hall prison have had previous employment in a public sector prison.

The Prison Service has borne no costs for damage to buildings, fittings and fixtures. I understand that Group 4 have spent £2,287 on materials at Buckley Hall in respect of damage incurred during reportable incidents.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many times, and in what circumstances, Group 4 has been financially penalised for failing to perform under the terms of its contract for Buckley Hall prison; [24096]

(2) how many times, and in what circumstances, default notices have been issued to Group 4 in respect of its performance at Buckley Hall; on how many occasions financial penalties have been levied in respect of default notices that have been issued; and if he will list in each case the reason for not levying financial penalties in respect of a default notice. [24093]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about improvement notices and financial penalties imposed on Group 4 in respect of Buckley Hall prison.

To date, no financial penalties have been imposed and four improvement notices have been issued. These relate to the standard of cleaning in the dining-room; the supervision of prisoners; the failure to provide an agreed number of industrial work places; and the provision of sentence plans and compacts for prisoners. Financial penalties have not been imposed because, in each case, the Prison Service has been satisfied that Group 4 has taken appropriate action to remedy the situation.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans there are for a full inspection of Buckley Hall prison by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons; and what is the intended date of this visit. [24169]

Miss Widdecombe: A full inspection of Buckley Hall prison will be undertaken in the first half of 1997. This is in accordance with the policy of Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons that all new prisons should be operational for some two years before being fully inspected: this is to allow processes and systems to become established.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many members of the Prison Service visited Buckley Hall prison on the 25 March; what were the grades of the Prison Service members; what was the purpose of the visits; and what conclusions were drawn by members of the Prison Service. [24173]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the purpose, grades and conclusions drawn by members of the Prison Service who visited Buckley Hall on 25 March.

The monthly progress planning meeting group was held on 25 March at Buckley Hall prison and was attended by Mr T A Bone, Area Manager for the Trans Pennine area; Mr S Eley, governor 3; and Mrs R Simpson, grade 7, of the Contracts and Competition Group at Prison Service headquarters.

The purpose of the meeting was to monitor the contract.

No specific conclusions were made.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the incidents which have occurred at Buckley Hall prison that have been reported to the Prison Service. [24170]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking for a list of the incidents which have occurred at Buckley Hall prison that have been reported to the Prison Service.

The attached table shows the number and types of incidents reported from 14/12/94 to 29/2/96 inclusive.

Incident type	Number of incidents
Abscond	4
Assault	19
Self harm	2
Attempted escape from escort	2

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what terms the original signed contract between the Prison Service and Group 4 for the running of Buckley Hall prison has been amended. [24277]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about amendments to the contract between the Prison Service and Group 4 for the running of Buckley Hall prison.

The changes made are described in the attached table.

Amendment number	Date of amendment	Subject of amendment
1(T)	22 November 1994	Extension of period for negotiation of Performance Measurement System
2 (S/T)	20 October 1996	Changes in procedures for visits, including the introduction of a requirement for prisoners to wear identification bibs, and to correct a typographical error
3 (T)	20 October 1996	Change of Prison Service representatives who are authorised to amend contract
4 (S)	16 January 1996	Incorporation of a Performance Measurement system and consequential change in amount of maximum penalty points, in any period of 12 months
5 (T)	7 March 1996	Clarification of arrangements for adjusting payments in the light of penalty points accrued under the Performance Measurement system

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 154, on smuggling into Buckley Hall prison, (a) what is the estimated cost of the additional fencing and the possible installation of external cameras, (b) who will be responsible for payment of such extra security measures and (c) who was responsible for the design of the initial prison fence. [24298]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison

Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the cost of additional fencing and installation of external cameras at Buckley Hall, as well as both the responsibility to pay for this extra security and the design of the initial prison fence.

The cost of additional cameras and fencing will be incurred by Group 4.

The initial prison fence is standard Prison Service design for category C prisons.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what investigations his Department will carry out into recent allegations about absconding by prisoners at Buckley Hall prison who have been given cleaning tasks outside the prison. [24299]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether an investigation would be carried out into recent allegations about absconding by prisoners at Buckley Hall prison who have been given the cleaning tasks outside the prison.

The Controller considered it unnecessary to carry out an investigation. The only prisoner to abscond from an outside work area had, up to the time of this incident in December, been a model prisoner, with the lowest security classification.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals there are for an investigation to be carried out into the prisoner who was recaptured in the car park of Buckley prison; if this incident was classified as an escape attempt; and what penalty was imposed on Group 4 following this incident. [24300]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether an investigation would be carried out into the circumstances of the recapture of a prisoner in the car park at Buckley Hall prison; if the incident would be classified as an escape attempt; and if a penalty would be imposed on Group 4.

The Prison Service Controller carried out an investigation into the recapture of a prisoner in the car park at Buckley Hall prison. the Prisoner was charged under Prison Rule 47, paragraph 7, escaping from prison custody. He was found guilty and warded the maximum penalty of 42 added days.

Group 4 have not been penalised.

Bosnian Refugees

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many refugees from Bosnia have been convicted of criminal offences in the United Kingdom; and how many have been deported as a result of conviction. [24042]

Mr. Kirkhope: The information requested is not held centrally.

Category C Prisoners

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of prisoners who have failed to return from authorised leave from each male category C prison and have subsequently been caught or returned voluntarily since 14 December 1994. [24097]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 3 April 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking the number of prisoners who have failed to return from authorised leave from each male category C prison and have subsequently been caught or returned voluntarily since 14 December 1994.

Regulations

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which of the 1,000 regulations identified for repeal or amendment by the Prime Minister are the responsibility of his Department; of those, which (a) have been repealed or amended and (b) are planned to have been repealed or amended by the end of the 1995–96 parliamentary Session; and if he will list those whose repeal has saved business more than £1 million per annum. [23658]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 2 April 1996]: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 2 April, Official Report, column 85.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Mature Students

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many mature students currently enter higher education in the Yorkshire and Humberside area; and what was the figure in each year since 1986. [23831]

Mr. Forth: The available information is given in the following table:

Mature[1] entrants to higher education in Yorkshire and Humberside[2]

Academic year	Number
1987–88	15,395

1993–94	26,427
1994–95 (provisional)	29,740

[1] Those aged 21 and over on an undergraduate course, and those aged 25 and over on a postgraduate course. Data for ex Universities Funding Council institutions are for full-time home entrants only throughout the time series.
[2] Entrants to institutions located in Yorkshire and Humberside.

EDS Ltd.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what savings to date have been made by her Department as a result of out-sourcing arrangements made with EDS computer system; what assessment she has made of the equivalent costs for carrying out this work in house; and if she will make a statement. [24239]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has made no out-sourcing arrangements for computer systems with EDS.

Barnsley and Doncaster TEC

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many days were taken over the European social fund audit at Barnsley and Doncaster training and enterprise council; what was the cost; and if she will make a statement. [24492]

Mr. Forth: The last visit to Barnsley and Doncaster training and enterprise council was made by auditors from Directorate General V of the European Commission in October 1993. The audit took one day to complete. Information on costs is not available.

Higher Education Expenditure

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the public expenditure per higher education student in cash and real terms for the years (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95 (c) 1995–96 and (d) planned for 1996–97, 1997–98 and 1998–99 (i) in total, (ii) on student support costs, (iii) on tuition costs and (iv) in capital expenditure terms; and if she will list these figures for the universities of (1) Teeside, (2) Sunderland, (3) Durham, (4) Northumbria and (5) Newcastle upon Tyne. [23702]

Mr. Forth: The total public expenditure per higher education student is set out in the tables. Information is not readily available for individual universities.

Capital Spending

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list in rank order of spending per pupil the initial Government borrowing allocation for education capital spending for the years (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96 and (c) 1996–97 for each local education authority. [23703]

Mrs. Gillan: Education annual capital guidelines totals for 1994–95 and 1995–96, pupil numbers in county and voluntary controlled schools at January 1994 and January 1995, and ACG cover per pupil are given in the following tables, in descending order. Pupil numbers for January 1996 are not yet available. Apart from small amounts for local education authority liability at voluntary-aided schools, ACGs cover capital work at county and controlled schools only. Bids are assessed against clear priority criteria, which are not based on pupil numbers, and the ACG cover is used for particular schools, not spread across all schools in the LEA.

Amounts actually spent by LEAs on capital work at their schools will differ from their ACG totals and full details are not yet available. In many cases the amount is somewhat higher than the ACG.

Office of Standards in Education Report

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list (a) the name, type and pupil number of each school that has failed an Ofsted report, by local education authority of location, (b) the number of requests to suspend an Ofsted report on grounds of (i) actual or (ii) possible closure by name, type and pupil number of each such school listed, by local education authority of location, and (c) if each such request was granted. [23704]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Education Authority Expenditure

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will place the non-London metropolitan local education authorities in rank order of expenditure per pupil at (a) primary and (b) secondary level for the years (i) 1993–94, (ii) 1994—95, (iii) 1995–96 and (iv) 1996–97. [23705]

Mr. Robin Squire: The following tables show net institutional expenditure per pupil in metropolitan councils in (a) pre-primary and primary and (b) secondary local education authority maintained schools in 1993–94 and 1994–95, the latest year for which outturn figures are available.

Computers

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the problem of non-recognition by computers of the year 2000 with regard to her Department's computers and those for which it is responsible. [24410]

Mr. Robin Squire: Officials who take responsibility for the Department's computer systems are keenly aware of the potential difficulties presented by the year 2000. During the coming months they will undertake a thorough audit of the software to establish the scale of the problem. They will then prepare and execute a plan of action to overcome them using, where necessary, advice from the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency and suppliers.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for her Department, indicating the targets set. [24504]

Mr. Robin Squire: The former Education and Employment Departments both had established "green housekeeping" strategies consistent with their business needs. Waste minimisation forms an important part of the DFEE integrated strategy, but specific targets have not been set.

Student Loans Company

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the status of the Student Loans Company. [25122]

Mr. Forth: Following a report by the National Audit Office, and with the agreement of its board, the Student Loans Company has been designated as a non-departmental public body with effect from 1 April 1996.

School Buildings

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her present estimate of the monetary value of the backlog of school buildings repair and maintenance. [22787]

Mrs. Gillan [holding answer 26 March 1996]: It is for local education authorities and school governors to assess the need for maintenance work in respect of school premises which they own and maintain.

Firlands Training Ltd.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she has taken to obtain information from the Department of Trade and Industry concerning its investigation of Firlands Training Ltd. under section 447 of the Companies Act into the liquidation of AST in 1995 and the fitness of its directors and other persons to be directors of public companies. [24431]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 2 April 1996]: It is not the policy of the Department for Education and Employment to comment on the affairs of individual companies.

Dance Training

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students were pursuing vocational training in dance (a) in 1979 and (b) in each of the past five years; and if she will make a statement. [23461]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 2 April 1996]: Information is not available for 1979. The number of students enrolled on further or higher education courses in dance in each year from November 1990 to 1993 is shown in the following table:

November	Number of students enrolled on FE or HE courses in dance
1990	6,600
1991	8,600
1992	7,100
1993	7,800

These figures exclude students in universities formerly funded by the Universities Funding Council, although the number of these students is likely to be small.

Directly comparable information for November 1994 is not available because of changes to the data collection systms for further and higher education students. However, the indications are that the number of dance students was broadly unchanged from 1993.

General National Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pre-16 students have begun GNVQ courses or have undertaken the GNVQ part one. [24366]

Mr. Paice [holding answer 2 April 1996]: Information on the total number of pre-16 students studying GNVQ courses is not held centrally. Some 6,000 students are currently studying part 1 GNVQ pilot courses.

Staff (Hourly Rates)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the lowest hourly rate for (a) full-time and (b) part-time staff employed (i) by central Government and (ii) by next steps agencies. [21481]

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

Two thirds of civil servants have their pay determined in 1995–96 under delegated arrangements, for which information on pay rates is not held centrally. The following figures relate to pay rates agreed under national arrangements.

The lowest national civil service pay rate is £4,669 per year for an administrative assistant and typist, aged 16 years. This is £2.43 per hour based on a net 37-hour week. Very few staff will be on this pay point. Aside from age points, the lowest national civil service pay rate is £6,928 for the administrative assistant grade, or £3.60 per hour for a net 37-hour week.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Controls

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list (a) the number and countries of destinations of licences approved under each heading of the Export of Goods Control Orders 1994, part III, group I and (b) the number and countries of destination of licences refused under each heading. [22654]

Mr. Oppenheim: Statistical analyses of export licences granted for military, paramilitary and security equipment during 1993, 1994 and 1995, with details of refusals in these categories in 1995, have been placed in the Library of the House. Details of licences refused for these categories of equipment in 1993 and 1994 are set out in the annual reports of the export control organisation of the Department of Trade and Industry for those years, which are also available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many applications for export licences were received under headings ML4, ML18 and PL5027 of the Export of Goods Control Order 1994 and how many were (a) granted and (b) refused. [24201]

Mr. Oppenheim: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of today to his related question.

Contracts

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many contracts for goods or services have been awarded by his Department and its executive agencies on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years; if he will list the companies involved and the value of the contract in each case; what percentage this represented of contracts awarded by his Department and its agencies after competitive tendering; and, in each case, why the contracts were awarded on the basis of a single negotiated tender. [22863]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Information relating to contracts is not held centrally and can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The chief executives of the Department's existing executive agencies have been asked to respond separately.

Data in respect of the former National Physical Laboratory, National Engineering Laboratory and Warren Springs Laboratory executive agencies are no longer readily available.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 29 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question concerning the number of contracts for goods or services awarded by The Insolvency Service on the basis of single negotiated contracts in the last three years, the companies involved and the values of the contracts, and why the contracts were awarded on this basis.

In the last three years The Service has awarded only one contract using the single negotiated tender procedure. In February 1994 Stoy Hayward were awarded the contract to undertake a feasibility study to assess the scope for private sector involvement in the case administration work of Official Receivers. The company had recently completed a pre-feasibility study of this matter and it was therefore considered appropriate to utilise the knowledge and understanding gained from their initial research in undertaking the second stage of the project. The value of the contract amounted to £72,263 (inc VAT).

Information regarding the percentage this contract represented of total contracts awarded by competitive tendering could only be provided at disproportionate cost given the number of contracts awarded by the Insolvency Service across its 33 sites.

Letter from David Durham to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 29 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade, the Rt Hon Ian Lang asked me to reply to your question about contracts awarded for goods and services on the basis of single negotiated contracts during the last 3 financial years by Companies House Executive Agency.

We have only examined contracts with a value of more than £10,000 since this is threshold above which, under DTI guidelines, competitive tendering is generally undertaken.

During the period there were two single negotiated contracts compared to a yearly average of 25 contracts awarded after competitive tendering.

The detailed information you sought is as follows:

Financial year	Company name	Goods/Services
1993/94	Guardian Computer Services	Disaster standby services
1994/95	Rank Xerox	4890 Laser Printer

The reasons for single tender action were respectively that in the first case the company was, as far as we were able to establish, the only one in the field providing disaster standby services for ICL 2980 mainframe computer systems; and in the second case that any other source would have required existing investment in printer driving software and data to be replaced.

In relation to contract value, it is not the Department's practice to disclose individual contract values, on grounds of commercial confidentiality. However, I can say that the combined value of the two contracts was approximately £450,000.

Letter from P. R. S. Hartnack to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 29 March 1996:

I am replying for the Patent office to your question to the President of the Board of Trade about the number of single negotiated contracts awarded in the last three years.

The single negotiated contract procedure is used only rarely for purchases over £10,000 when urgency, monopoly supplier or other factors demand it. In 1994/5 Peter Prowse Associates, a PR company with intellectual property experience, was appointed to help in advertising activities at a cost of £75,000, and after advice was sought from other Government Departments a CCTV security camera system was purchased from Sensormatic CamEra Ltd for £100,000 to help control an increase in thefts from motor vehicles from the Office's headquarters site. In 1995/6 £80,000 was spent with Sun Microsystems to provide access to Internet since the Patent Office had standardised on SUN UNIX equipment. A Docuprint print engine was also purchased in 1995/6 for £105,000 from Rank Xerox as part of an IT development project.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 29 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about single tender action. I regret that the information you requested can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Letter from R. D. Worswick to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 29 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about contracts awarded by the Laboratory of the Government Chemist (LGC) on the basis of single negotiated contracts in each of the last three years.

LGC follows a procedure based on the principles set out in the DTI's Procurement Manual for purchasing goods and services which forms part of its quality system accredited to BS EN ISO 9001. Single negotiated tendering would only be used where the nature of the goods or services makes competitive tendering pointless (and would need to be justified in writing by the person authorising the expenditure), except in the case of low value purchases (where likelihood of repeat orders also becomes a consideration). However the specific information you request cannot be provided without considerable expenditure of effort at disproportionate cost to the Laboratory.

Electro-shock Equipment

Mrs. Clywd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what occasions (a) Security Defence Marketing Services and (b) Compass Safety International have (i) requested and (ii) been granted an export or transhipment licence with regard to electro-shock batons. [23026]

Mr. Oppenheim: It has been the practice of successive Administration not to reveal details of applications for export licences or export licences. However, in view of the current public interest in the matter, I am prepared, by way of exception, to confirm that, from 1991, the point from which records are readily available, there were no such occasions.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 2 March 1996, Official Report, column 716, what was the country of origin and receipt for the 1993 licence for the transhipment of electronic batons. [23028]

Mr. Oppenheim: I refer the hon. Member to the Minister for Science and Technology's letter to her of 3 August 1995 in response to her question tabled on 17 July 1995. For the reason given in that letter, I am not prepared to release any further details about this matter.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to what extent human rights considerations were taken into account before the granting of transhipment licences for electro-shock equipment in 1993. [23027]

Mr. Oppenheim: The same consideration was given to this application as applies to all others.

Parcel Force

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if Parcelforce has a monopoly on foreign parcels coming into the United Kingdom from overseas; and what responsibility they have for claims for loss or damage. [23403]

Mr. Oppenheim: Parcelforce has a monopoly on foreign parcels that enter the UK under Universal Postal Union arrangements. Claims for loss and damage on items for delivery by Parcelforce in the UK would normally be settled by the overseas post office. Parcelforce would pay claims on any items posted in the UK for delivery abroad.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what obligations are placed on Parcelforce to deal with complaints and claims for loss or damage to parcels posted to the United Kingdom from overseas. [23402]

Mr. Oppenheim: The Universal Postal Union parcels agreement specifies how claims for loss or damage for incoming international parcels posted to the UK should be handled. The Post Office is a party to the agreement and its procedures for claims for such parcels comply with it.

Meat Industry (Job Losses)

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made in respect of (a) Staffordshire and (b) each other county of the number of (i) temporary and (ii) permanent job losses in the meat industry following the recent developments in respect of bovine spongiform encephalopathy. [24101]

Mr. John M. Taylor: At the moment, no estimate has been made by my Department.

Birds Eye Walls

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what steps he will take to ensure that the Monopolies and Mergers Commission delivers to his officials investigating Birds Eye Walls provision of misleading information, all necessary papers, including transcripts of oral evidence, relating to the 1994 investigation into ice cream; [24458]

(2) if he will now refer Birds Eye Walls to the Director of Public Prosecutions in respect of the ice cream market. [24457]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I am satisfied with the co-operation which I am already receiving from the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Any criminal investigation that might be required will be undertaken by my Department and not by the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Guinness plc

Mr. Maxton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he plans to publish the report drawn up by the inspectors from his Department into the affairs of Guinness plc following their appointment by his predecessor in December 1986. [24356]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The inspectors have not yet completed their inquiries into the membership and affairs of Guinness plc and in consequence are not in a position to submit a final report. When they are, it will be carefully considered for publication.

Unregulated Gasoline

Dr. Michael Clark: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the sale from garage forecourts of lead replacement gasoline not regulated by a specific British standard. [24810]

Mr. Page: At the time of the last Budget, the Government decided to remove most of the excise duty advantage from higher octane unleaded petrols, which include lead replacement gasoline. The drafting of British standards is the responsibility of the British Standards Institution, BSI.

Waste Minimisation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on progress in establishing an office waste minimisation strategy for his Department, indicating the targets set. [24512]

Mr. Page: The Department plans to commission an independent study to improve existing information about office waste with a view to setting a waste minimisation target by the end of this year for its headquarters offices.
